The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which Senate bill No. 489 was referred to the Committee on Pensions. Is there objection? There is none. The vote is reconsidered and the bill is before the Senate. The Senator from Missouri moves its indefinite postponement. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

J. H. SANDERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I make the same request with regard to the bill (S. 1334) for the relief of J. H. Sanders. By an oversight it was introduced by request and referred to the Committee on Claims, when I had previously introduced Senate bill 555 for the relief of the same party.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that the vote by which Senate bill 1334 was referred to the Committee on Claims be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate. Shall it be indefinitely postponed?

The motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE IN PUERTO RICO AND CUBA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 335) for the collection of revenue within the island of Puerto Rico may be recalled from the Committee on Finance and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Finance be reconsidered? The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for a similar order with reference to a bill (S. 336) for the collection of revenue within the island of Cuba during its occupation by the military forces of the United States. I ask that that bill may be recalled and referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire requests a reconsideration of the vote by which Senate bill 336 was referred to the Committee on Finance. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

OBLIGATIONS TO NEW POSSESSIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I present a resolution, which I ask may be read, printed, and lie on the table. I shall have occasion to speak to it at some future day.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the American people and the several States in the Union have in times past, at important periods in their history, especially when declaring their independence, establishing their constitutions, or undertaking new and great responsibilities, seen fit to declare the purposes for which the nation or State was founded and the important objects the people intend to pursue in their political action; and

Whereas the close of a great war, the liberation by the United States of the people of Cuba and Puerto Rico in the Western Hemisphere and of the Philippine Islands in the far east, and the reduction of those peoples to a condition of practical dependence upon the United States, constitute an occasion which makes such a declaration proper: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this Republic adheres to the doctrines which were in the past set forth in the Declaration of Independence and in its national and State constitutions.

That the purpose of its existence and the objects to which its political action ought to be directed are the ennobling of humanity, the raising from the dust of its humblest and coarsest members, and the enabling of persons coming lawfully under its power or influence to live in freedom and in honor, under governments whose forms they are to have a share in determining and in whose administration they have an equal voice. Its most important and pressing obligations are:

1. To solve the difficult problem presented by the presence of different races on our own soil with equal constitutional rights. To make the negro safe in his home, secure in his vote, equal in his opportunity for education and employment, and to bring the Indian to a civilization and culture in accordance with his need and capacity.
2. To enable great cities to govern themselves in freedom, in honor, and in purity.
3. To make the ballot box as pure as a sacramental vessel and the election return as perfectly in accord with the law and the truth as the judgment of the Supreme Court.
4. To banish illiteracy and ignorance from the land.
5. To secure for every workman and for every working woman wages enough to support a life of comfort and an old age of leisure and quiet, as befits those who have an equal share in a self-governing State.
6. To grow and expand over the continent and over the islands of the sea just so fast, and no faster, as we can bring into equality and self-government, under our Constitution, peoples and races who will share these ideals and help to make them realities.
7. To set a peaceful example of freedom which mankind will be glad to follow, but never to force even freedom upon unwilling nations at the point of the bayonet or at the cannon's mouth.
8. To abstain from interfering with the freedom and just rights of other nations or peoples, and to remember that the liberty to do right necessarily involves the liberty to do wrong, and that the American people has no right to take from any other people the birthright of freedom because of a fear that they will do wrong with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be received, and at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts it will lie on the table, subject to his call.

Mr. COCKRELL. And be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed.

PROPERTY EXEMPT FROM TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate an itemized statement of all the real estate in the District of Columbia exempt from taxation and the authority for such exemption, excepting the property owned either by the United States or the District of Columbia.

Also an itemized statement of all the real property in the District of Columbia acquired by the United States and the District governments since the year 1863, inclusive.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from North Dakota whether he is not aware that this resolution will require a very bulky document to be sent to the Senate, and whether he desires to have all the particulars which are mentioned in the resolution reported to the Senate?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I have looked the matter over, and I do not think that the document forthcoming will be very bulky or voluminous.

Mr. CHANDLER. The resolution requires a description, I think, of all the different pieces of real estate which are assessed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. On the last assessment roll there was about $402,000,000 worth of assessable property in the District of Columbia. Of that amount there was about $9,446,000 worth that was exempt from taxation. I understand that some of the persons who have charge of some portions of the property which is exempt from taxation have declined to construct sidewalks about their own property and that the District has been obliged to construct those sidewalks. The object of the resolution is to ascertain the property by description—I understand those descriptions are very brief and can be made in a very short time—to ascertain the number of pieces of property in the District that are exempt from taxation, so that we may locate this fault, if fault it be.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be again read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The resolution covers only about $9,000,000 worth of property in the District.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought there not to be a clause there requiring the Commissioners to report the private property upon which the payment of taxes has been refused? I think it is exceedingly important that we should know those pieces of property upon which the payment of taxes has been refused by the owners and expect the public to pay for them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, and if he desires to add that to the resolution I will accept it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will move to amend the resolution by inserting the words "also indicating the property upon which payment of taxes has been refused."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota modifies the resolution by accepting the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I desire to say as to the resolution which was just passed at the instance of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] that the amendment which I offered was not exactly in the proper language. I ask that the vote by which the resolution was passed may be reconsidered, so that the exact words which I desire to have inserted may be added to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the resolution was agreed to will be regarded as reconsidered, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. On my motion these words were inserted in the resolution: "Also indicating the property upon which payment of taxes has been refused." After the word "payment" I move to strike out the words "of taxes has been refused" and insert "for the construction and maintenance of sidewalks has been refused."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate an itemized statement of all the real estate in the District of Columbia exempt from taxation and the authority for such exemption, excepting the property owned either by the United States or the District of Columbia.

Also an itemized statement of all the real property in the District of Columbia acquired by the United States and the District governments since the year 1863, inclusive; also an itemized statement indicating the property upon which the payment for construction and maintenance of sidewalks has been refused.

IMPROVEMENT OF LEMON CREEK, NEW YORK.

Mr. PLATT of New York submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit a report of survey and estimate for the improvement of Lemon Creek, Richmond County (Staten Island), N. Y., in the construction of a training dike at the outlet into Princess Bay, and the extension of the present dredged channel a further distance of 1,000 feet.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings and proceedings as may be had before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported the foregoing resolution without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed and delivered to the Senate document room, for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies of House bill 1, as reported to the Senate from the Finance Committee, with amendments, December 19, 1899.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, authorized to have printed such papers and documents as may be ordered by the committee and necessary for the business of said committee during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

INTERCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement of number published and the number distributed of the official reports on the projected Intercontinental Railway through the three Americas, and also how many, if any, of said reports remain undistributed.

COAST SURVEYS.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to submit to the Senate of the United States a report on—

1. The progress and present state of the survey of the coast of the United States, including Alaska.
2. The present condition and progress of surveys which may have been inaugurated on the islands now under the jurisdiction of the United States.
3. His recommendations as to further surveys in said islands.
4. The bearing of the recommendation contained in his last annual report on the use of the metric system of weights and measures in the proposed surveys of said islands.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR WITH SPAIN.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a copy of all the testimony taken by the commission appointed to investigate the conduct of the war with Spain, together with a copy of the report of said commission.

Mr. HAWLEY subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago a resolution was passed that I should have asked some attention to if I had been watching. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a copy of all the testimony taken by the commission appointed to investigate the conduct of the war with Spain, together with a copy of the report of said commission.

I believe that commission reported to the President. I really do not know how bulky the testimony may be or how valuable it may be; but I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, with a view of committing the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to reconsider the vote by which the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] was agreed to. The question is on that motion.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This is simply a resolution for information—to have sent to the Senate a copy of the evidence taken before the commission to investigate the conduct of the war. It seems to me that the Senate can be intrusted with this information, and it is very proper that it should be sent to the Senate. The question of printing the document is a question which will be considered by the Senate after we shall have received a copy of the testimony.

I certainly hope that this effort at inquiry for facts which the Senate should be in the possession of will not be smothered by a reference of all such resolutions to the Committee on Military Affairs or to any other committee of this body. I understand that there is much of the evidence taken by the commission bearing on many questions which ought to be in the possession of the Senate, and I very much hope that this resolution will not be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

It has been the custom of the Senate, when a Senator desired information from one of the Departments of the Government, to pass resolutions asking for such information. Is this a new departure instituted for the purpose of carrying out a studied policy? Is it along the line of the suppression of news of the operations of our Army in distant lands? Is it prompted from the same source which has suppressed information, not because it may go to the enemies of the country, but suppressed information for fear of its effect upon the American people themselves? A few days ago I offered a resolution asking for information with regard to the recognition of the Filipino republic, which was promptly laid upon the table. That resolution had laid upon the table for two days, and undoubtedly the majority of the Senate had sought to ascertain the facts and found that we had saluted the Filipino flag; that we had accompanied their vessels of war with our vessels of war and compelled the surrender of a Spanish garrison.

Therefore it was thought necessary to lay the resolution upon the table rather than seek the information. If the answer could have been that we had not recognized the Filipino flag, do you think the resolution would have been laid upon the table? No, Mr. President; the information would have been promptly furnished. The fact is that we did recognize the Filipino flag. The fact is that we accompanied a vessel commanded by the forces of Aguinaldo to Subig Bay, and the fact is that two vessels of our Navy compelled the surrender of a Spanish garrison and turned the prisoners over to the Filipino republic. Those are the facts, and yet we have been told so often by the Administration that these are not the facts, and now the Senate refuses to pass a resolution calling upon them for a report of the facts in this connection. When we ask, after the war is over, after peace is declared and a treaty ratified, for information with regard to the conduct of the war, the usual course is not pursued, but it is proposed to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There are many things in connection with the conduct of this war with Spain that ought to be brought to the attention of the people of the United States. Not alone should the report of this commission be made public, but another commission ought to be appointed by the Congress of the United States in order to expose the corruption and mismanagement in connection with the war with Spain. The purchase of army transports and the renting of army transports ought to be looked into. Rumors come to our ears—information that is, I believe, from authentic sources—that in the employment of transports to take troops to the Philippine Islands we have paid, in many instances, two or three times more than the same vessels were offered for. We have purchased ships that were worthless, condemned, and unseaworthy at prices far greater than those at which ships that were valuable and seaworthy might have been bought.

Now, is the result of this investigation, are these facts to be communicated to the American people and to the Senate? Is the policy of a censored press in the suppression of news to be adopted by this body in the suppression of facts which might in any way injure the chances for a reelection of the present Administration? It seems to me that these questions are far more important than the triumph or success of any political party. I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will not reconsider this resolution and refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, but will continue the usual custom, which has been the passing of resolutions which simply ask for information.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the Senator does not surprise me in being facile in discovering improper motives. He belongs to the class of original discoverers in that line. I do not think he is justified in talking about smothering. Nothing that I know of that was worth looking at has ever been smothered in the Military Committee.

I only wish to know whether the testimony given before the President's commission is worth publishing, and, if so, how bulky it is, to what extent it goes, and whether it dispenses with the necessity of a regular committee upon the conduct of the war, such as we had during the civil war, or whether there still ought to be that sort of a committee. If the Senate thinks it wise, I have not the slightest objection in the world to the appointment of a committee like that we had during the civil war for a thorough investigation of the whole conduct of the war.

The commission in this case was one appointed by the President to perform certain duties. It was the President's commission. It did conduct a more or less thorough examination. I do not know whether the testimony is all preserved, but I presume it is. The commission also made a report, which was given to the whole country. I am only exercising the ordinary precaution in a matter of this kind in asking time for a little inquiry regarding it. Nobody supposes that I would smother it or would shirk from an exposure of anything that has been going on.

I adhere to my motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, Mr. President.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that, if I am not mistaken, the commission referred to in the resolution was chosen by the President—

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Without any legislative sanction, and the report was necessarily made to the President. I claim and believe that we have a perfect right to have that information. It would be only just and proper that the legislative body of this country, in legislating upon the same subject-matter, should have the information the President had, and which the public has paid for. I suggest that the resolution be changed so that the President be requested to send the testimony to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. So far as, in his opinion, it be not incompatible with the public interests.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; let it be in the usual words. I hope that in that form the resolution will be passed, for I think it is right and proper we should have this information. When it comes to us, then the Senate will determine as to the propriety of publishing it and everything of that kind.

Mr. HAWLEY. I make no objection to the change suggested, and I would then agree to the proposition. We shall, however, have to reconsider the adoption of the resolution in order to make the change suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PETTIGREW. With that understanding, I have no objection to having the resolution as it was passed reconsidered and amended as suggested by the Senator from Missouri and again passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the resolution was passed will be regarded as reconsidered; and the resolution is now before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the resolution as I have suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments suggested by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out of the resolution the words "Secretary of War" and insert "President;" and, after the word "hereby," it is proposed to strike out "directed" and insert "requested, if, in his judgment, not incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say one word respecting the pending resolution before it is agreed to. I think it calls for very valuable information, and I believe the whole of the testimony taken by the commission, as well as its report, should be sent to the Senate. I have no doubt it will be found a bulky document, but, even though it be bulky and comprise several volumes, I think it is a valuable document that ought to be sent here and printed at the public expense. I desire to say for myself that I hope no objection will be made to its printing. I am sure those who made this investigation and the President of the United States will have no objection to the widest publication of the document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments which have been stated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL HEARINGS.

Mr. MORGAN. I move the printing, for the use of the Senate, of the usual number of copies of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives on the new Panama Canal Company, the Maritime Canal Company, and the Nicaragua Canal Company, held January 17 to 25, 1899. This document has passed out of print and was never printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for an order to print the document named by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

AFFAIRS IN SAMOA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

Bartlett Tripp, the member of the Samoan Commission on behalf of the United States of America."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO PRINT ON THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday there was an agreement by unanimous consent that gentlemen who had addressed the Committee of the Whole on the financial question should have five legislative days within which to print their speeches after the disposition of that bill. Now, some gentlemen around me have raised the question as to whether those five legislative days will carry the leave to print over until the reassembling of Congress after the holidays? I think myself they would, but it is desired that there shall be no mistake about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Texas that that proposition was resisted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], as the Chair remembers, and a different conclusion was reached. Members who had addressed the committee were to have five days within which to file their remarks with the Public Printer, as the Chair recalls.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I did not understand that that request was resisted.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is mistaken. We had quite a little conversation over it, and at the conclusion of it the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] again submitted his request, substantially in the same language as at first. I again objected, and then he submitted a request for five days, and that was the order made by the House.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. I see, by referring to the RECORD, the gentleman is correct about that. The suggestion was made to me here, and I had read only the part of it which referred to the legislative days. I delivered a speech on that bill, and, supposing that I would have until after the holidays closed, I had not even examined the stenographic report. I shall have to ask the leave of the House to print my speech.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman understands, of course, that he has until Saturday under the previous order.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. But no RECORD will be issued after to-morrow, and therefore the privilege until Saturday would be a barren one.

The SPEAKER. The order, as the Chair recollects it, was that gentlemen may file remarks with the Public Printer within that time, without any question as to when the next RECORD will appear. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. None at all, if I can have until Saturday.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. STALLINGS appeared and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 1476. An act creating a commission to revise and codify the pension laws of the United States; and

S. 718. An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause certain lands heretofore withdrawn from market for reservoir purposes to be restored to the public domain, subject to entry under the homestead law with certain restrictions.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same.

H. R. 4152. An act to extend the time for examination of monthly accounts by bureaus and offices of the War Department.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 718. An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause certain lands heretofore withdrawn from market for reservoir purposes to be restored to the public domain, subject to entry under the homestead law with certain restrictions—to the Committee on Public Lands.

S. 1476. An act creating a commission to revise and codify the pension laws of the United States—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. PAYNE. For what purposes?

Mr. BROWN. I have a resolution I desire to offer.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield one moment: not more than a minute.

Mr. PAYNE. I will withdraw the motion and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROW. I do not see my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] in his seat. He made some corrections, and in the confusion of yesterday I did not know that he was speaking about my statement; but as he is not in his seat I will leave it until after the recess.

Mr. GAINES. I am in the House.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, it will not take but a few minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I yielded to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

[Cries of "Division!"]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 79.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 106, answered "present" 7, not voting 160; as follows:

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent for a few minutes to make some corrections as to the facts of history.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of committees.

Mr. GROW. Is not a request for unanimous consent in order before that motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROW. Is not a request for unanimous consent in order before such a motion is put, or before the regular order is proceeded with?

The SPEAKER. If the call for the regular order is insisted on, it is impossible to recognize the gentleman for unanimous consent now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask if it is not in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in order that discussion may be had? If that motion is in order, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded and insisted upon, the Chair thinks that it will not be in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union take precedence of the regular order?

The SPEAKER. After the regular order is demanded and insisted upon, it will not be in order until one hour is consumed in the consideration of some bill. The Clerk will proceed with the call.

The Clerk called Committee on Elections No. 1.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROW. That is clearly a dilatory motion, Mr. Speaker. The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it. [Cries of "Division!"]

The SPEAKER. Who demands a division?

Mr. GROW. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 80.

Mr. PAYNE. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 94, answered "present" 6, noted by the Speaker as present 3, not voting 177; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The following additional pair was announced:

On this vote:

Mr. SMITH of Illinois with Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I am paired, and I desire to withdraw my vote. I voted in the negative.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am paired, and I desire to be noted as "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the demand for the regular order having been passed, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow].

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that there is no question before the House.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent to occupy not exceeding five minutes' time in making some corrections of statements in the remarks made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I understand it, under all the rules and precedents of the House, when a motion is made by a member in charge of a measure and it is antagonized and that motion is lost, the floor, as a matter of course, reverts to the opposite side.

Now, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] rose, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moved to adjourn, as against the gentleman from Pennsylvania. When his motion failed, I say that under all the rules and under all the precedents and customs of this House the floor reverts to the gentleman who was seeking it when the motion was made to cut him off. I sympathize profoundly with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in his ineffectual efforts to lead the House to a successful adjournment. [Applause and laughter.] But, notwithstanding that, my point of order is that the floor reverts, as a matter of right, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow].

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has had the floor and made his request, and it has been objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, as the Chair is not clear on the question, what the gentleman from Tennessee thinks of it, under the circumstance, where there is nothing before the House for debate—no question up?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] desires, whether he has made a motion or not, but as I understand it, the floor reverts to the gentleman who was seeking the floor, in order that he may make known what he desires, whether it is a motion or a resolution or a bill he is offering, or whatever it may be. I have never known that rule to be applied in any other way than that the floor was to be yielded to the other side. I have seen it done in a Democratic House, Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Carlisle was occupying the chair. When a motion on this side failed (Mr. Carlisle being the Speaker), he always yielded the floor to the other side, and so with Mr. Speaker Reed. I think that has been the rule of every Speaker, so far as I know, and I speak candidly and sincerely when I say it has always been the rule to award the floor immediately to the side contending for it when the adverse vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee fails to comprehend the question of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg pardon.

The SPEAKER. There would be little doubt about the question if there were some matter up for debate—something before the House; but where there is no question before the House for debate, the Chair would like to hear the views of the gentleman from Tennessee under those circumstances.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I remarked, I do not know what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] is seeking the floor for. It may be to make some motion or it may be to make a speech.

The SPEAKER. It was to ask unanimous consent. That has been manifest.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I will rise, then, to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman has the right, under the rules of the House, to state what he desires, at any rate, and that the House by the adverse vote on the motion to adjourn meant to express the desire that he be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will suspend. The gentleman from Pennsylvania rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. GROW. I think it has been held to be a matter of personal privilege for a gentleman to correct his statements in the House, if they have been misrepresented by a member. That is a personal question. That is what I rise to, and I desire not to exceed five minutes' time to make that correction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, subject to the right to stop him if it proves to be otherwise than a question of personal privilege, the Chair would like to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceed and will hear what he has to say. [Applause.]

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] on yesterday, while making his speech, stated that what I presented to the House concerning the legislation of the country on the financial question was incorrect. Owing to the noise and confusion on that side of the House, I was not aware that the gentleman was controverting any of my positions; therefore it passed by without my notice. I desire at this time to make that correction. My statement as to facts in the legislative history of the country from 1862 to 1878 was a correct statement. It is for that kind of a personal explanation that I ask the consent of the House for five minutes' time.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this presents no question of personal privilege.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] alludes to a reply to this speech that I made yesterday, and I tried to make the gentleman hear me. I hope the House will give him a chance to explain the mistake that he made a few days ago; in that speech I think I demonstrated yesterday there were mistakes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will once more submit the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] that he have unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. GAINES. I hope that opportunity will be granted him to correct his own mistake.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GROW. Now, Mr. Speaker, I certainly should have given the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] my attention if I had understood that he was discussing the points of a speech that I made on Friday last. The point is simply this, that at the time Congress authorized the issue of greenbacks, and the first $500,000,000 loan, in all the discussions in the House at that time the word "coin" was used alternatively and indiscriminately with the word "gold." Mr. Spaulding, who was chairman of the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee that reported the legal-tender bill, and Mr. Stevens, who was chairman of the committee, made this kind of argument, that if we did not collect the duties in coin it would be impossible to get the gold to pay the interest on the bonds without selling bonds for it. They used the word "coin" in one place and "gold" in the other.

The exception as to the legal-tender quality of the greenbacks was as to customs dues. They were not to be received at the custom-house, and have never been since, and the statement I made was that the pledge of the Government in the act of the 25th of February, 1862—which was the beginning of the indebtedness which my friend from Tennessee calls the war bonds—the pledge was that we would collect the duties on imports in coin, and I said that coin was regarded in the discussion as gold. And for the years after 1862 to 1878 the duties collected were in gold.

We collected in reality gold and nothing else. This was the practice of the custom-house with the importer. In my statement I excepted amounts under $5, for I supposed then such amounts were paid in subsidiary silver coin. But I find that the actual practice at the custom-house during that time was for the importer to pay the amount in gold, and if his payment exceeded the amount of the duties the Government paid him back the change in subsidiary silver coin, and the money that went into the Treasury was thus entirely gold from 1862 to 1878, and the pledge of the act of February 25, 1862, was to pay the bonds in the coin so collected. The coin collected was set apart as a special fund to be used, first, to pay the interest on the bonds and the notes of the United States, and, next, to redeem 1 per cent of the entire debt after the 1st day of July, 1862. That pledge of the Government stands to-day.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] read decisions of the courts of the country, a great number of cases, that coin meant both gold and silver. Granted. I never claimed that the statutes which used the word coin did not include both gold and silver in the word coin, but that the Government in its transactions had never paid any of its bonds or notes (that is, greenbacks) created during the specified time and previous in anything but gold, and that it was gold collected at the custom-houses in actual business. And that was understood by the legislators of the country for the period I have named, from 1862 to 1870; and in talking about coin it was always used in contradistinction to paper.

In paying the bonds of the United States, whenever they were paid at maturity, they were not paid in anything except gold, and no duties were collected during that period but gold, and we pledged that the coin so collected should be set apart as a special fund for the purpose of payment of bonds and notes.

That is what I claimed would be fair and common honesty between man and man in the transaction of business. The understanding then was that it was to be gold. How did it ever come to be changed? The insisting that silver could be used in good faith to pay these bonds is what shook the credit of the Government. There was nothing but subsidiary silver coin at that time of any great amount, and who would ever think of paying $1,000,000 in half dollars, quarters, and 10-cent pieces?

The whole understanding during that time, when paper money only was in circulation, was that coin legally included both gold and silver, but coin in any large amount to be used by the Government was considered to be gold and nothing else; and the decision of the courts as to the legal meaning of the word "coin" has nothing to do with the good faith of the Government in paying its debts contracted under a special arrangement. In the collection of custom dues during that period none of any consequence was collected in anything except gold, and the plighted faith of the Government was to set apart for a specific purpose—that is, to pay the bonds and notes—the money so collected at the custom-house.

When the idea started that greenbacks could be used to pay bonds was the commencement of shaking the credit of the country, so that when we came to make a loan under President Cleveland's Administration it cost the country $16,000,000 for the amount loaned by reason of the discredit that had come to it. I voted against putting "gold" in those bonds, for I never will vote to give any human being a better security than was given to the men who lent this nation their money in the crisis hour of its peril, or one that, by putting gold in, implied that all others could be paid in silver.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROW. I hope our filibuster leader will now take the floor. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state—

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be allowed five minutes, inasmuch as the gentleman has referred to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that on the last roll call the Chair stated that the ayes were 78, the noes 94, and 6 present. There were three others present, Mr. GILL, Mr. MESICK, and Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, who were noted, but not announced by the Clerk, as should have been done, to show the quorum. The Chair calls attention to it now, so that the Journal may stand correct.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes in which to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes to respond to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to learn from his own lips that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] has at one time in his life voted on the side of the plain people. [Laughter.] Although he has frequently made speeches on the floor of this House at the present session, he has not at a single time admitted or stated to the House or in the press that he ever voted against the payment of our bonds in gold. After the infamous measure has passed which he voted for on Monday last, in which we placed, without consideration, the word "gold," not only in our past bonds, which he refused to do thirty years ago, he now comes up and admits, as a saving clause before his constituents, that at one time in his life, thirty years ago, he voted not to place the word "gold" in these war bonds.

I have not misled the gentleman. I have not misstated the history of my country. I stated that it was not true, though the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] differed with me, that Congress held, "between 1862 and 1878," that "coin" in our bonds meant gold only, and I stick to it. And I am supported by the acts of Congress and the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which I cited—7 Wallace, page 26, decided in 1868, and 3 Wallace, page 326, decided in 1865.

The gentleman said, furthermore, Mr. Speaker, that our "duties" were collected in gold because the word "coin" meant gold only, and went so far as to quote the act itself in which the word "coin" appears, which I will read from his own speech, as follows: "And all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin." Mr. Speaker, neither the gentleman nor any of his friends can say that I misrepresented him, and I am somewhat surprised that the distinguished gentleman, for whom I have always borne so much respect, should say, in the House of Congress, that I have misrepresented him. I have not, but, on the contrary, sir, he has misrepresented the deliberations of Congress and the opinions of the highest courts in the land, and I shall prove it.

I read, Mr. Speaker, from 3 Wallace, page 326. Here was a case where the importer refused to pay his imports, and judgment was had in the Federal courts for "gold and silver coin." The Supreme Court of the United States, affirming that decision, used this potential language:

The whole case shows that the judgment was for duties on imports, and nothing but gold and silver coin has been made legal tender for this description of indebtedness to the Government.

"Nothing," Mr. Speaker, "but gold and silver coin"—not gold alone, but "gold and silver coin"—could pay our duties, says the court. And with such particularity did the lower court construe the word "coin" that the first decree for "gold coin" only was (at the same term of court) changed, and judgment was entered for "gold and silver coin for duties." This was made a ground of exception, but the Supreme Court of the United States in this case (3 Wallace, 326) overruled it and affirmed the judgment making the duties payable in "gold and silver coin," the court being unanimous in this opinion. The case was decided in 1865—between '1862 and 1878"—a period during which the gentleman says our lawmakers treated the word "coin" in our tariff laws and bonds as not meaning "anything but gold."

Again, Mr. Speaker, in 1869 it was undertaken, as I said in my speech yesterday—that the gentleman has evidently read this morning—to put the word "gold" in our bonds, and the gentleman now confesses that he voted against it, as did his Senators in 1878. If coin then meant gold only, why did you not put gold in the bonds then? [Applause on the Democratic side and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope both sides of the House will join with the gentleman in his motion.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 12 o'clock m., January 3, 1900.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1706) for the reference of certain claims against the Government of the United States to the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, a full copy of the report of R. H. Rosa, superintendent of logging on the Chippewa ceded lands in Minnesota, made to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and dated December 18, 1899.

NEW YORK BANK TRANSACTIONS.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate complete and literal copies of all letters, communications, agreements, papers, and documents between the Treasury Department of the Government of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or either or both of them, since the 4th day of March, A. D. 1897, in any manner respecting the deposit of public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States with said bank or banks, and inform the Senate respecting any other relation or relations now or heretofore existing between the Government of the United States and the said bank or banks, and the amount of money, bonds, public funds, and revenues, respectively, deposited in said bank or banks by the Government of the United States, the reasons therefor, and whether said bank or banks have paid the Government of the United States any interest on said deposit or deposits, and if so, how much interest, and the length of time the money, public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States were held on deposit by said bank or banks, and whether said money, public funds, bonds, and revenues, or any portion thereof, were loaned to other banks, corporations, or persons, giving their names and addresses, respectively, and if so, the amount and dates thereof, respectively.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further directed to inform the Senate what compensation has been paid to said bank or banks, directly or indirectly, by the Government of the United States for the custody, handling, and disbursement of said money, public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States, and give to the Senate all other information in any manner pertaining to said transaction or transactions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over, and be printed.

CAPE NOME DISTRICT, ALASKA.

Mr. PERKINS. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent that it be considered immediately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to submit to the Senate of the United States a report on any investigations that may have been made by the Geological Survey in the Cape Nome district of Alaska.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the resolution be read again.

The resolution was again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to its consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from California that he likewise add "any investigations made by the agents of the General Land Office." I understand that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has sent certain special agents to the Cape Nome country, and it would be quite as well to procure at the same time the information collected through that arm of the Government. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. PERKINS. I would have no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana, but I think it should come in the form of a separate resolution. This data has already been prepared by the engineers who were sent to Alaska last year under the supervision of the Geological Survey, and it can be immediately transmitted to the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. I do not object to the resolution, nor do I insist upon my suggestion of amendment.

The resolution was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether General Torrea, one of the officers of the Philippine army, came to General Otis with a flag of truce on February 5, 1899, the day after the fighting commenced between our forces and those of the Filipinos, and stated to General Otis that General Aguinaldo declared that fighting had been begun accidentally and was not authorized by him, and that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of a width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflict between the two armies, and whether General Otis replied that fighting having once begun must go on to the grim end. Was General Otis directed by the Secretary of War to make such an answer? Did General Otis telegraph the Secretary of War on February 9, 1899, as follows: "Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference. Have declined to answer." And did General Otis afterwards reply? Was he directed by the Secretary of War to reply; and what answer, if any, did he or the Secretary of War make to the application to cease fighting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

Mr. LODGE. Let it go over.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let that resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. SEWELL. Would it not be better to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Military Affairs? I make that motion, if the Senator from Connecticut will consent.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not hear the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, I agree to that course. Let it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that it may go over until to-morrow, so that we can have an opportunity to see it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

REPORT ON AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,000 copies of so much of the civil report of Maj. Gen. John R. Brooke, military governor of the island of Cuba, made to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, with accompanying papers and documents, as is in the English language, together with a prepared index, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Relations with Cuba be, and is hereby, authorized to have printed such papers and documents as may be ordered by the committee and necessary for the business of said committee during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

MELISSA DOOLEY.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill (S. 490) granting a pension to Melissa Dooley is now pending before the Committee on Pensions. I move that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from its further consideration, so that the bill may be brought before the Senate and indefinitely postponed, because the beneficiary has died and no right accrues to her heirs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I now move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to announce that, with the permission of the Senate, I shall call up on Wednesday, the 10th instant, immediately after the morning business, the resolutions offered by me December 4, 1899, in relation to the death of the Vice-President of the United States.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Committee on Finance propose to modify, with the consent of the Senate, the substitute reported from that committee on the 19th of December, 1899, for the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes. In order that the proposed amendments may be printed for the information of the Senate, I now offer them and ask that they may be printed separately, and that the substitute be printed as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island, from the Committee on Finance, reports certain amendments to House bill No. 1, and asks that the same may be printed separately, and that the amendment in the nature of a substitute hitherto reported may be printed with the amendments now reported.

Mr. ALDRICH. That the substitute heretofore reported may be printed as now modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As modified. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to say further that, in accordance with previous notice, I shall call up the bill to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. Call up the House bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Call up the House bill with the substitute. I heretofore gave notice that I would call it up at 2 o'clock to-morrow. At that time I shall, for the committee, make an explanation of the provisions of the bill.

Senators about me suggest that the bill might be called up to-morrow immediately after the morning business. I have no preference about it, but, in accordance with that request, I give notice that I shall call up the bill immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall object to that, for one.

Mr. COCKRELL. And I, for two.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well. Then I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to be allowed to observe that if there is to be an absolute suppression of all the information desired by members of the Senate in regard to the important duties we have growing out of our new relations it is well to understand it. A Senator this morning introduced a resolution inquiring of the War Department as to the facts in regard to the outbreak of hostilities in the Philippines, how it came about, and how that terrible and deplorable condition of things which has been going on there for the last six months was begun. It has been the universal custom of the Senate from the beginning, so far as I know, to grant to any one Senator information of that kind—there being no possible harm to the public service—if he desired it for his guidance in the discharge of his public duties, and yet four Senators jumped to their feet at once to object to that simple inquiry. If that is to be done, and if the United States Senate is to be abolished, I want, for one, to understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. What question is before the Senate, Mr. President? If there is any, I desire to speak to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts did not understand that I was trying to suppress him or any other Senator, or that I was trying to interfere with that Senator's judgment as to what measures should have preference before the Senate, either now or at any other time. I certainly withdraw the suggestion I made to take up the financial bill in the morning hour to-morrow, and ask that it be taken up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Senator's suggestion to be to take the bill up after the routine morning business to-morrow, which seemed to be a proposition to cut off from consideration the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

Mr. ALDRICH. I said if there was no objection to that course I would make that request.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does not "routine morning business" include resolutions coming over from a previous day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. HOAR. Never.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator chooses to differ with the President of the Senate; but no matter. The only thing that took place was an objection under the rule to a resolution offered this morning for which immediate consideration was asked. Objection was made, which took it over to the next legislative day; and I object to being criticised for making that objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object to one word in the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. All I asked was that that resolution should lie over. My colleague on the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SEWELL] suggested that it be referred to a committee. The final result is that the resolution simply lies upon the table until to-morrow.

My friend from Massachusetts used the word "suppression." There has been nothing done but simply an ordinary protest. I could not distinctly understand the bearing of the resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota as it was read at the desk in the usual way, and we want to have time to read it in print before we take it up for action.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not understand when a Senator makes a respectful request for information to instruct him in the discharge of his public duties that it is the ordinary usage of the Senate to object to it. I understand the custom to be otherwise.

Mr. HALE. If an era of peace is restored I will offer a resolution as morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

STENOGRAPHER TO COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs is hereby authorized to employ a stenographer in hearings before such committee, the expense of the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the rate of compensation paid for ocean mail service, said service being performed by first-class ship, and, further, whether the said service is paid by statute mile or nautical mile.

PENSION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is now in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the Calendar.

The bill (S. 1477) in amendment of sections 2 and 3 of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890, was announced as first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has requested that pension bills may be passed over this morning, as he is necessarily detained from the Senate and desires to submit some amendments to them. Without objection, such bills will be passed over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. There seems to be no pressing bill on the Calendar, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 4, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 3, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.
The Journal of the last session was read and approved.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and base it upon a certain publication which I send to the Clerk's desk, asking that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A story is told of Representative JOHN W. GAINES—

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what this is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he rises to a question of personal privilege. The matter will be read, to ascertain whether it is or not. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A story is told of Representative JOHN W. GAINES of Tennessee, which may explain the rapid somersaults made by a good many members on the Roberts case. Before the House met Mr. GAINES declared emphatically that he would vote to admit Roberts. His case could then be referred, after he was seated, to the Judiciary Committee for investigation, and if he were found ineligible he could be expelled. This, Mr. GAINES said, was the only legal course to pursue.

However, when the test came, Mr. GAINES voted against Roberts. Asked for an explanation, Mr. GAINES said:

"I still think that Roberts has the law on his side; but self-preservation is the first law of nature. My duty is to look after my own seat and let Roberts look after his."

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I would not reply to this foul assault upon the position that I took in that matter if the New York World, the paper containing it, did not circulate amongst an intelligent people who do not know me personally. The people who send me here, and I dare say the people who know me in this House, have never accused the Representative from the Hermitage district of Tennessee of ever taking a cowardly or unpatriotic position in this House or out of it.

Mr. Speaker, I denounce the publication as wholly without foundation and absolutely false, and thank the House for this opportunity to state as much. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

RESOLUTION OF INQUIRY REGARDING NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution and ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. Let the resolution be read for information, and we will see whether it is privileged or not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish the House of Representatives as soon as possible with the following information:

1. All letters, agreements, papers, or documents between the Treasury Department of the United States or any person connected therewith, and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any person acting for them or either of them, since the 4th day of March, 1897, relating to the depositing of public funds, bonds, or revenues in said bank or banks, or any other relations or business transactions now existing or heretofore had between the Government and the said banks or either of them.

2. The SPEAKER. This is in no sense a resolution of privilege, but must go to the Speaker, to be referred to the appropriate committee, under Rule XXII.

The Chair calls attention to paragraph 3 of Rule XXII. After referring in paragraph 1 to private resolutions, it says:

3. All other bills, memorials, and resolutions may in like manner be delivered, indorsed with the names of members introducing them, to the Speaker, to be by him referred—

The titles, etc., to be indorsed thereon.

Paragraph 5 of Rule XXII provides that—

All resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments shall be reported to the House within one week after presentation.

The rules are not only distinct and explicit in saying what shall be done with these resolutions of inquiry, but the practice as long and well settled must certainly be known to the gentleman from New York. The rules are so explicit also that no harm can come, as the committee is bound under the rules to report within one week. The Chair therefore rules the matter to be not privileged, and not in order for immediate consideration.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, then I understand if the committee does not report this resolution within a week it becomes a matter of privilege?

The SPEAKER. Then it becomes a matter of privilege, as laid down by the rule.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just read. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, that resolution ought to go to a committee, of course, in order that the committee may perfect the resolution if it needs it. I hope there will be a speedy report.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution will follow the course laid down by the rule.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The matter will be referred as required by the rule.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. BRICK, until Friday next, on account of the death of a friend.

To Mr. FITZPATRICK (on the request of Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky), indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BABCOCK obtained leave, by unanimous consent, to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Henry Fenner, House bill 3404, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, did you say that the resolution I offered went over under objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It went over under objection.
Mr. PETTIGREW. By whom was the objection made? I did not hear any Senator address the Chair and make an objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Dakota can hear the objection now, if he wishes to make a technical point upon the matter.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I simply wanted the record kept straight; that was all.

STATISTICS RELATIVE TO CRIME.

Mr. HOAR (by request) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,500 copies of the report transmitted by the Secretary of State of the Commissioner for the United States on the International Prison Commission on "Crimes, misdemeanors, and penalties" in the United States, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for distribution by the Department of State.

PAYMENT OF WITNESSES.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before the Senate or any of its committees shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, $3, and $3 for each day spent in traveling to or from the place of examination by the usual route. A witness shall also be entitled to be reimbursed his necessary expenses for traveling to and from the place of examination, in no case to exceed the sum of 7 cents a mile for the distance by him actually traveled for the purpose of appearing as a witness.

Mr. HOAR. That is rather an important resolution, and I would not ordinarily ask for its passage without reference to a committee, but it is quite material, in view of some investigations which are to be begun very soon, that this change should be made; and I think if I may be allowed to make a brief statement every Senator will see the propriety of it.

At present the rule allows to witnesses $3 a day while they are in attendance and 7 cents a mile each way. In point of fact, when coming from distant parts of the country it gives a great profit to the witnesses. There are many cases where a witness's whole traveling expenses would not amount to more than $75 or $100, and the witness gets $250 or $275.

I suppose the ground on which the Senate acts, as all other legislative bodies, in prescribing these rules is that the witness shall not make a profit out of the matter, but shall be paid his actual expense. The duty of traveling and appearing is a duty which, like jury duty, every citizen owes at some time, and he is not to be paid a profitable salary for it.

This proposed rule gives the witness $3 a day, which is supposed to be an ordinary and average price for board, during the whole time he is traveling and the whole time he is attending here. Then it allows (which of course would be certified by the President of the Senate if the proceeding is before the Senate or by the chairman of the committee where it is before a committee) his actual necessary traveling expenses, whatever they are, not to exceed 7 cents a mile.

I hope the resolution may be adopted without a reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution proposes to amend a rule, an order of the Senate, does it not?

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Chair's pardon; it is a standing order. In the edition of the rules prepared by the learned occupant of the chair it appears under the caption "Standing orders of the Senate not embraced in the rules," and it has never been considered that an amendment of the standing orders has to be adopted like an amendment of the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,440 per annum during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

REPORT ON REINDEER IN ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into the district of Alaska" for 1899.

NEW YORK BANK TRANSACTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ALLEN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate complete and literal copies of all letters, communications, agreements, papers, and documents between the Treasury Department of the Government of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or either or both of them, since the 4th day of March, A. D. 1897, in any manner respecting the deposit of public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States with said bank or banks, and inform the Senate respecting any other relation or relations now or heretofore existing between the Government of the United States and the said bank or banks, and the amount of money, bonds, public funds, and revenues, respectively, deposited in said bank or banks by the Government of the United States, the reasons therefor, and whether said bank or banks have paid the Government of the United States any interest on said deposit or deposits, and if so, how much interest, and the length of time the money, public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States were held on deposit by said bank or banks, and whether said money, public funds, bonds, and revenues, or any portion thereof, were loaned to other banks, corporations, or persons, giving their names and addresses, respectively, and if so, the amount and dates thereof, respectively.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further directed to inform the Senate what compensation has been paid to said bank or banks, directly or indirectly, by the Government of the United States for the custody, handling, and disbursement of said money, public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States, and give to the Senate all other information in any manner pertaining to said transaction or transactions.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in deference to the suggestions of several Senators, I desire to modify the resolution by striking out the words "complete and literal," before the word "copies," in line 3; so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all letters, communications, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska modifies the resolution heretofore submitted by him. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether General Torres, one of the officers of the Philippine army, came to General Otis with a flag of truce on February 5, 1899, the day after the fighting commenced between our forces and those of the Filipinos, and stated to General Otis that General Aguinaldo declared that fighting had been begun accidentally and was not authorized by him, and that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of a width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflict between the two armies, and whether General Otis replied that fighting having once begun must go on to the grim end. Was General Otis directed by the Secretary of War to make such an answer? Did General Otis telegraph the Secretary of War on February 9, 1899, as follows: "Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference. Have declined to answer." And did General Otis afterwards reply? Was he directed by the Secretary of War to reply; and what answer, if any, did he or the Secretary of War make to the application to cease fighting?

Mr. PETTIGREW. One or two Senators have expressed a desire to speak upon the resolution, and, as it is to be discussed, I ask that it lie over, without prejudice, until the next meeting of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without going to the Calendar?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the resolution may lie over until the next day's session of the Senate, retaining its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ask the leave of the Senate to make a brief statement, not exactly a personal explanation, but in the nature of a personal explanation. It will take but two or three minutes, and I think it will be a matter which will probably relieve all Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I receive in my mail daily a good many letters—and I dare say the same is true of all members of the Senate—appealing to me with great earnestness to vote to deny a seat in the Senate to a gentleman from Pennsylvania who claims a seat by reason of an appointment made in the recess of the legislature by the governor of that State. Some of the writers of these letters are Quakers, members of the Society of Friends; others are evidently very philanthropic persons; and I am to assume that they are very good judges of character, because their letters are full of personal compliments to myself [laughter], and I dare say the same is true of the letters received by other Senators. The proposition, however, is that I must vote—and they are surprised at my having any doubt about it—to deny a seat in this body to the gentleman who claims it under an appointment on the ground of certain charges that they make against him in regard to his personal character and fitness for the office.

A good many years ago I investigated the question of the right of the governor of a State to appoint, and I suppose I have made eight or ten elaborate speeches during the last fifteen years in favor of the proposition that whenever during the recess of the legislature of a State, there was a vacant seat in the representation of that State in the Senate, the governor had the right to fill it, and I have made three or four reports in favor of that proposition.

The Senate is the body, the court, the judge of the election of Senators. I am one of the sworn judges, and what these worthy gentlemen are asking me to do is, in substance, to stuff the ballot box and make a false return in my capacity as a sworn judge of elections because they think the governor of a State ought to have appointed somebody else.

That is the attitude which these worthy gentlemen are taking, and I see that some newspapers of wide circulation in my own State and a good many in the State affected take the same view of the case. Of course the same principle would require Senators, if the legislature should elect this gentleman or some other against whom such charges can be maintained, to deny him a seat when the legislature has elected him. If the governor has no right to appoint or the legislature has no right to elect, then of course we do not admit the claimant. But if the governor have the right to appoint or the legislature have the right to elect, and we declare that they have not appointed him or have not elected him when they have, we are doing exactly what is done by ballot-box stuffers and election judges who make false returns.

I hope this little statement of mine regarding such communications—in which I am sure every member of this body without exception will concur—will answer as a reply to the great batch of letters I am getting on this subject.

PROPOSED PRINTING OF AN ADDRESS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to have the paper which I send to the desk printed as a document, and I ask unanimous consent that that may be done. It is a speech delivered by the Hon. Carl Schurz on October 17, 1899, on the policy of imperialism.

Mr. HAWLEY. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not hear the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the speech which he has sent to the desk may be printed as a document.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the title of it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the title.

The SECRETARY. "Address by the Hon. Carl Schurz, delivered October 17, 1899, on the subject of the policy of imperialism."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota for printing the address as a document?

Mr. CARTER. I object to the printing of this class of matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection.

SECOND HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is now in order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 762) granting settlers the right to make second homestead entries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read at length for information subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.
The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That any person who, prior to the passage of this act having made a homestead entry, but for any cause lost or forfeited the same or for any reason failed to perfect or secure title in fee simple to the land embraced therein, or who, having perfected or secured such title, did so by what is known as the commutation of his homestead entry under section 2901, United States Revised Statutes, may make a homestead entry of not exceeding one quarter section of any of the public lands in any State or Territory subject to such entry.

Sec. 2. That any person desiring to make another entry under this act will be required to make affidavit, to be transmitted with the other filing papers now required by law, giving the description of the tract formerly entered, date and number of entry, and name of the land office where made, or other sufficient data to admit of readily identifying it on the official records.

Sec. 3. That on the proper showing being made by any qualified applicant under this act, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, that his former entry has been lost or forfeited for any cause, and that he has not perfected or secured title thereto under the homestead law, or who, having perfected title thereto, did so under section 2901 of the United States Revised Statutes, and having all other proper qualifications of a homestead entryman, the register and receiver will, without further showing, on payment of the usual fees and commissions, allow his said application and make his entry of record.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was the bill introduced?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say, if the Senator will listen to me a moment, that the bill was introduced at the present session of Congress and has been reported back unanimously from the Committee on Public Lands. It is identically the same bill which was reported and passed last year.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was it reported?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Several days ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can not find it on the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It was reported December 18 and is No. 7 on the first page of the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I reserve the right to object until I hear an explanation.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Where persons have lost their homestead rights the bill simply permits the taking of a second entry. It was unanimously reported last year and passed the Senate without objection. This year the bill has the unanimous support of the Committee on Public Lands. I think it is carefully guarded in every particular.

Mr. COCKRELL. What action has been taken by the Interior Department regarding the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not tell the Senator. I do not remember whether or not the bill was referred to the Interior Department. It simply allows, where a man has not secured title to a homestead without paying for it, the right to take another 160 acres—nothing more.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the report made by the Senator from South Dakota I find a communication from the Secretary of the Interior and one from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I supposed the Senator had read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That was in last year's report, and I had forgotten that those officers had made a report on the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let those communications be read.

Mr. SPOONER. Were the reports unfavorable?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know. I have not had time to examine them. They are not very long, and I ask that they may be read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Those communications were on the bill reported last year, and not on the one reported this year.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know whether those communications were made last year or not. The report was made last year, but it was at this session of Congress. The bill was reported December 18, 1899.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; adopting last year's report. I have not this year read the letters from the Interior Department, and do not know what they contain. I know, however, that the committee was unanimous in regard to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the communications to which I have referred be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communications referred to by the Senator from Missouri will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 9, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on S. B. 364, "granting settlers the right to make second homestead entries."

The objections made by the Commissioner to the bill are that it allows a second entry where the first entry was lost or forfeited for any cause, and that such a provision would open the door for speculative entries and subvert the purpose of the homestead law; also, that the bill should be made to operate prospectively as well as retrospectively, and that persons who, in the future, through adverse or uncontrollable circumstances and through no fault of their own, are compelled to abandon their entries, should be allowed to make a second entry as well as those who, prior to the passage of said bill, for similar reasons, were compelled to abandon their homestead entries.

I concur in the Commissioner's conclusions.

Very respectfully,

C. N. BLISS, Secretary.

Hon. R. F. PETTIGREW,

Chairman Senate Committee on Public Lands.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 3, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt, by Departmental reference, under date of March 30, 1897, for report in duplicate and return of papers of Senate bill No. 364, granting settlers the right to make second homestead entries, which has been referred to the Department by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, with request for its views thereon.

The purpose of this bill is to remove the disqualification of persons who, prior to the passage of the act, had made a homestead entry, but who, for any cause, lost or forfeited the same or for any reason failed to perfect or secure title in fee simple to the land embraced in their entry, except by purchasing the same under what is known as the commutation provision of the homestead law.

The act is practically an extension of the privilege conferred by the second section of the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 854), except as to that provision of the bill now under consideration which makes subject to its provisions all homestead entries which have been perfected under the commutation clause of the homestead law.

Such a provision, however, was embodied in the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 1004), providing for the disposal of the Seminole lands in the Territory of Oklahoma; also in the act of February 13, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 759), providing for the disposal of lands in Oklahoma acquired by agreement with the Sac and Fox Indians; also in the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 1043), providing for the disposal of the lands in Montana ceded by the Crow Indians; and in the act of March 3, 1893, providing for the disposal of the Kickapoo lands in Oklahoma—all of which provided that any person who having attempted to, but from any cause failed to, acquire a title in fee under the homestead law, or who made entry under what is known as the commutation provision of the homestead law, shall be qualified to make homestead entry of said land.

The act of September 29, 1890 (26 Stat. L., 496), restoring to settlement forfeited railroad lands, also contained the provision that "any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the homestead or preemption laws, or who has from any cause failed to perfect the title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under either of said laws, may make a second homestead entry under the provisions of this act."

The act of December 29, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 599), amending section 3 of the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 854), permitted any settler who had theretofore forfeited his or her entry by reason of being unable from a total or partial destruction of crops, sickness, or other unavoidable casualty to secure a support for himself, herself, or those dependent upon him or her, to make entry of not to exceed a quarter section on any public lands subject to entry under the homestead law and to perfect title to the same under the same conditions in every respect as if he had not made a former entry.

It will be thus seen that Congress has from time to time passed special laws relieving against the disqualification of homestead settlers who had failed to perfect their entries, but all of said laws either have reference to a particular locality or are intended to operate retrospectively and not prospectively.

If the act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 854), as amended by the act of December 29, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 599), was so amended as to be general in its application and to operate prospectively, it would, in my judgment, be sufficient to grant relief in all meritorious cases, inasmuch as it would be left largely to the discretion of the Department to determine whether the causes of abandonment were sufficient to enable the entryman to make a second entry and thus to prevent voluntary abandonment prompted by purely speculative motives.

The bill under consideration is, in my opinion, objectionable for the reason that by allowing a second entry where the first entry was lost or forfeited for any cause would open the door to speculative entries and subvert the purpose of the homestead law.

If it is deemed advisable by Congress that the bill should become a law, I would suggest that it be made to operate prospectively as well as retroactively, as no reason appears why those who in the future may, from similar causes, fail to perfect entry to their homesteads should not receive the same relief as those who have in the past forfeited their entries.

Very respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems the matter has received attention. The criticism made by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office was as to the possibility of speculative entries. I confess very frankly that I can not well see how such speculative entries can be made. Neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the communications which have been read explains how advantage can be taken of the provisions of this bill by speculative entries or how they can result in speculative entries.

The bill should be amended in one particular—that is, it should be made to apply to the future as well as to the past, thus making a general rule. That was recommended, but I do not see that it is in the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The committee discussed that matter and thought it unwise to have the provisions of the bill relate to cases in the future. We could see no chance to practice fraud as to those cases already in existence, but we feared that there might be some advantage taken if parties could contemplate the taking of an entry, its abandonment, and then the taking of another entry. Therefore we did not frame the bill so as to comply with the recommendation of the Department, and I think for the reason I have stated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOID PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 386) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on public lands and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands" was announced as first in order.

Mr. BERRY. I was absent from the Chamber for a moment and did not catch exactly what that bill is. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE] if that is the bill which came from the Committee on Public Lands in regard to refunding money to those who paid $2.50 an acre for lands where a railroad was not built?

Mr. McBRIDE. That is the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. BERRY. Is the Senator trying to have that bill passed this morning?

Mr. McBRIDE. I did not call up the bill, but it came up regularly this morning on the Calendar. I should, however, be very glad if the Senate would consider it and pass it this morning.

Mr. BERRY. I do not think it is a bill that should pass very quickly. It will require some discussion. I did not expect it to come up this morning, and I would rather it should go over, if the Senator is willing.

Mr. McBRIDE. I have no objection to the bill going over, if it is understood that it shall retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. I have no objection to that understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over, retaining its place.

ACCOUNTS WITH PUBLIC-LAND STATES.

The bill (S. 764) fixing times when, regulating the manner in which, and declaring the character of the accounts between the United States and the several public-land States relative to the net proceeds of the sales and other disposition of the public lands made and to be made therein by the United States, which shall hereafter be stated and certified to the Treasury Department for payment, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 20, section 2, after the word "cash," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That where the Government has once paid the 5 per cent on lands within the Indian allotments or Indian reservations, that no further or other payment shall be made or liability exist from the United States in case said lands thereafter become a part of the public domain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge why California is specified and other States are not specified?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I think California was excluded from the existing law, which applies to all the other States. That is the reason why California is specially designated. The bill as it stands now applies to all public-land States. I understand that the existing law in regard to the 5 per cent does not apply to California. The State has never had the benefit of it. This makes the existing law apply to California as it applies to all the other States. There was some clause in regard to the admission of California which left out that provision.

Mr. ALLEN. Is any other State in that position?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, sir; California is the only State.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota what amount is involved in the bill. The page in charge of my records here has not put this bill in with the others and therefore it has now come into my hands for the first time. As I understand the bill, it will give to the land States, or the particular States designated, 5 per cent not only upon the lands that were sold for cash, but also upon all lands that were disposed of by bounty land laws, warrant applications, and also grants to railroads, grants to canals, and the Indian reservations. In other words, it will practically make the United States pay 5 per cent of the net proceeds, estimated at $1.25, upon all the lands in the respective States named. Now, is not that the effect of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, a portion of the statement of the Senator from Missouri is correct and a portion is not correct. The bill provides that 5 per cent shall be paid upon existing Indian reservations and Indian allotments and bounty land warrants, but not on land grants to any corporation whatever. It does not embrace land grants to any railroad, canal, or other corporation. The bill simply extends to the public-land States the provisions of the law passed, I think, in 1854 in regard to Mississippi, which provides that the Government shall pay the 5 per cent upon permanent Indian reservations and also upon lands entered by military bounty land warrants. That law applied to all the public-land States then in the Union. But it has been held by the Department—and I think it is questionable whether their holding is or is not correct—that it did not apply to States admitted thereafter, and this bill extends the provisions of that law to the States admitted after that time.

This is a just measure. It has been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Public Lands many times, and from the best estimate I can make there will be taken about $12,000,000 out of the Treasury under its operations, but the amount will be distributed over several years of time. Some persons have made the amount more than that, but from the best estimate I can make I do not think the sum will be over $12,000,000, and only a small portion of that amount the first year.

Mr. COCKRELL. I find that probably, although I am not certain, the provisions of the pending bill are not quite so comprehensive as I supposed. Section 2 says:

That said accounts so stated shall include, embrace, and apply to all of said lands heretofore or which hereafter may be sold, located, or disposed of by the United States for cash or bounty land warrants, or land scrip, or certificates of any kind, or agricultural college scrip, and to all lands allotted to Indians in severalty, except from taxation.

That evidently ought to be "exempt," although it does not amount to anything. I call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to that point. On page 2, line 14, where the word "except" appears, should it not be "exempt?"

Mr. PETTIGREW. It should be "exempt."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It should be "exempt."

Mr. COCKRELL. The section continues:

And shall include all former and existing Indian, military, or other reservations in said States.

Evidently the word "except" there ought to be "exempt," and I move—

Mr. PETTIGREW. It should be corrected so as to read "exempt."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that will be corrected by the clerks.

Mr. COCKRELL. The first section says that the Department shall submit—

Statements of the accounts between the United States and each of the several public-land States, including California, for 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in each of said States which have been heretofore or may hereafter be made by the United States and not already paid by the United States to said States, and upon such statements of accounts by the Secretary of the Interior he shall thereupon supervise, correct, and certify such statements of accounts to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment.

The only clause that would embrace lands granted to corporations and all that would be "or bounty land warrants, or land scrip, or certificates of any kind." I do not presume that certificates have ever been issued in former times to any of the railroad corporations to which grants have been made or to any of the canals.

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, I think we issued the patents direct; but I shall not object at all to an amendment which shall provide that the provisions of the bill shall not apply to lands granted in aid of the construction of railroads, wagon roads, or canals.

Mr. CARTER. No certificate has ever been issued in any land-grant case. The proceeding consists in the filing of certain lists of selections made by the land-grant company. These lists or selections when made become the basis upon which patents subsequently issue from the Government to the land-grant company. In the meantime no certificate or other evidence of title is issued by the General Government, except the patent itself.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, this is a very important bill; it involves a large amount of money. If I remember correctly, an estimate was made by Commissioner Lamoreux during the Fifty-fourth Congress that it would cost not less than twelve or fourteen million dollars. I do not think that will cover the cost of it. I think it will amount to eighteen or twenty million dollars; perhaps more than that, if the bill becomes a law.

The proposition to pay 5 per cent on lands which were disposed of by military land warrants and bounties has been pending in Congress for a great many years. It had been discussed and I think a bill for that purpose had been defeated in the Senate before I became a member of it. This bill goes far beyond that. It proposes not only to give 5 per cent on all the lands disposed of by military land warrants, but to give 5 per cent upon all Indian reservations, those which have been disposed of as well as those Indian reservations still existing. I think, Mr. President, that the bill ought not to pass.

Unless the bill has been amended since it was before the committee, it provides for 5 per cent upon existing Indian reservations; and when the Indian title may be extinguished those lands will become subject to homestead entry and the Government will receive from them no money whatever. If you pay 5 per cent on that class of lands, then I can see no reason why 5 per cent should not be paid upon all lands which have been taken by homestead entry, and that, instead of twenty millions, would cost hundreds of millions. Without at length debating this bill, it seems to me for the Government now to undertake to give 5 per cent to those States on all Indian reservations—those heretofore disposed of and the lands not disposed of—and on all military land entries would be an injustice, and it would take money from the Treasury which the Government ought not to put out.

These are my views in regard to the bill. I stated them to the committee before the bill was reported and gave notice to the Senator from South Dakota that I could not support it. That I believe is about all that I care to state in regard to it. I think the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to insert after the word "States," in line 16, section 2:

But shall not include any land granted, donated, or in any manner transferred to any railroad, wagon road, or canal, or to any State, corporation, or association.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to the amendment. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "States," in line 16, section 2, it is proposed to insert:

But shall not include any land granted, donated, or in any manner transferred to any railroad, wagon road, or canal, or to any State, corporation, or association.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. In line 15, section 2, I move to strike out:

And shall include all former and existing Indian, military, or other reservations in said States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "taxation," in line 15, section 2, it is proposed to strike out:

And shall include all former and existing Indian, military, or other reservations in said States.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire again in the Senate, as I did as in Committee of the Whole, to move to strike out the words which I indicated in lines 15 and 16.

I simply wish to say to the Senate, as I have said before, that the Government heretofore has never paid 5 per cent upon any lands which were disposed of by homestead or preemption where no money was paid. It has only paid 5 per cent upon the amount of the sales of lands. Now it is proposed in this bill to make the Government pay 5 per cent upon all lands which heretofore have been included in Indian reservations, or which to-day are in Indian, military, or other kinds of reservations. The very moment the Indian title is extinguished, as I stated, those lands become, under the general land law, subject to entry under the homestead law, and the Government will never receive one dollar for them, because they will be homesteaded by citizens of the different States; and yet the Government will be paying 5 per cent on those lands, estimated at $1.25 an acre.

Can the Senator tell the Senate why, if we pay 5 per cent upon those Indian lands which are taken up by citizens under homestead, we should not pay 5 per cent upon all homestead lands in all the States of the Union? Many of the States have no Indian reservations. Their public lands have been disposed of by homestead entry. No 5 per cent is paid to those States, because the law does not provide for it; neither does this measure. Yet it is proposed, so far as concerns those which have Indian reservations, while the lands hereafter, when the Indian title is extinguished, will be disposed of under the homestead law and the Government will receive no money, to take out of the Treasury and pay to the States 5 per cent upon $1.25 an acre for those lands, whether the Government gets any money or not. It seems to me that the amendment ought to be adopted.

I know the temper of a good portion of the people of the country now—at least of the members of the Senate and of the other House—to vote any and all appropriations that may be proposed; but it seems to me that this is a waste of public money; that it is unfair and unjust to those States in which lands have been disposed of in a different way and which got no 5 per cent on the $1.25 an acre, and I do not think it ought to be paid on Indian and military reservations. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, just a word in reply to the Senator from Arkansas. The Indian reservations which have been opened to settlement during the last few years have not been thrown open to settlement under the homestead law, but we have inserted a provision which requires the settler to buy the land in every case.

Mr. BERRY. Not in all cases, Mr. President.

Mr. PETTIGREW. It has become the settled policy of the Government to require the settler to pay for the land, even though he enters it under the homestead law.

If hereafter the Congress of the United States should pass a free-homestead bill, as we ought to do, and open up these lands to homestead entry without requiring payment for them—for under the existing law in some instances the settler is required to pay $3.60 an acre—then a provision can be inserted in that law which will exempt the Government from the liability to pay 5 per cent upon the land so disposed of. But until that is done this bill is just, and the 5 per cent ought to be paid.

The theory of the Government is that the 5 per cent is in lieu of taxes; and if within the borders of a State there is an Indian reservation occupied by an undesirable population from which no taxes can be collected to support the State government, there certainly is no case so strong as that why the Government should pay 5 per cent. Heretofore when the Government received $1.25 an acre for preemption entry, 5 per cent went to the State, and the land immediately became taxable and helped to support the burdens of the local government. But an Indian reservation, never taxable, sparsely settled, a place which breeds crime and causes expense, contributes nothing to the State government or to the maintenance of order along the borders of the reservation. This bill simply provides that the State shall receive the 5 per cent, and no stronger case can possibly be stated than can be made in favor of that special provision of the bill.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Arkansas proceeding?

Mr. BERRY. I shall occupy only a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, in the first place the Senator from South Dakota is not correct when he says that all Indian lands are to be disposed of by being paid for. But this Government has never heretofore paid one dollar on any lands that were not already disposed of and paid for by the purchaser to the Government. This bill proposes to take out of the Treasury 5 per cent on $1.25 an acre for all these Indian and military reservations, whether they are sold or unsold and regardless of what disposition may be made of them hereafter. Is that just and fair to the States having no military reservations? Where the lands are disposed of by homestead entry and no money comes to the Government, the Government has never paid any 5 per cent, and it ought not to pay it. Then why should you take these military and Indian reservations not yet disposed of, including millions of acres of land, and pay to those States now, before the disposition of the lands and before the Government receives one dollar, from the Treasury of the United States, 5 per cent, estimating the value thereof at $1.25 an acre? You may pass the bill; you may vote down the amendment, but it is unjust to the other States, it is unfair, and it is a bill that ought not to pass.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator from South Dakota to explain, if he will, the theory upon which the military reservations are included in the bill.

Mr. BERRY. Yes; the military reservations are included.

Mr. SPOONER. I asked the Senator to explain the theory upon which they are included, if he will.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In some instances there are permanent military reservations. The same reason, it seems to me, applies that applies to an Indian reservation. However, an amendment has been recommended by the committee and adopted by the Senate which provides that if the reservations are afterwards disposed of the 5 per cent shall not be again collected. I know an instance of a military reservation embracing several townships of land which otherwise would be subject to entry and which would be occupied by people who would pay taxes and help to support the State government and local government. This reservation is situated near a town, its dimensions are very large, and its whole area is exempt from all the burdens of government in that locality. The reservation tends to increase the number of crimes and offenses.

Mr. SPOONER. A military reservation?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir; the soldiers go to the town and become intoxicated, and there is a population of that sort which has to be taken care of. Those burdens are all borne by the people who live about there, and on the frontier this is well known, of course, to be the fact.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to give particular attention to the pending bill, but I am not able to see from the explanation made by the Senator from South Dakota any possible reason why the military reservations should be included in it, whatever may be said about the Indian reservations. It is proposed by the Senator, as I understand, or by the bill, that when the military reservation is sold—

Mr. PETTIGREW. Move to strike it out.

Mr. SPOONER. It is proposed that when the military reservation is sold there shall not be another payment of 5 per cent. In other words, then, so far as the military reservation is concerned, this is an advance of 5 per cent by the Government to the State in contemplation of the possible sale of the military reservation at some future time.

Mr. BERRY. And Indian reservations also, if the Senator will permit.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand a military reservation is largely for the protection of the citizens of the State, and you find them very often in the vicinity of Indian reservations, with a view to protecting the people of the locality. It is not a mere luxury on the part of the Federal Government in the benefit of which the people of the State do not participate. In a large sense it is to provide for the public defense; it is in the interest of the general welfare, but it is of local value peculiarly. We find very often—it has so happened many times since I have been a member of this body and that is not long—

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will accept an amendment to strike out "military reservations."

Mr. SPOONER. We very often find gentlemen from Dakota and Wyoming and other Western States, called frontier States, begging the Government of the United States, in the interest of the safety of their people, to establish and maintain military reservations.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will accept an amendment to strike out "military reservations."

Mr. SPOONER. And the notion that the Government, using its own domain for a purely and necessary governmental purpose, shall advance to the State on account of it 5 per cent as upon a sale seems to me to be the height of absurdity. Will this include the Yellowstone Park? Will it include the park in the State of Washington?

Mr. BERRY. Absolutely.

Mr. SPOONER. Parks; Government lands set aside—

Mr. PETTIGREW. It does not include parks.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not see why they were omitted, in view of other provisions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], on which he demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 15, section 2, it is proposed to strike out:

And shall include all former and existing Indian, military, or other reservations in said States.

Mr. BERRY. I have moved to strike out those words. The Senator from South Dakota says the bill does not include parks. Let us see what it does.

Mr. SPOONER. It does.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It does.

Mr. BERRY. I have moved to strike out "and shall include all former and existing Indian, military, or other reservations in said States." That is the language of the bill. It seems to me it would include every kind of a reservation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It does include them.

Mr. BERRY. Of course it does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT of New York (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD]. Has he voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. PLATT of New York. Then I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY], who seems to be absent. I do not know how he would vote. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote, but if I were at liberty, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WELLINGTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. I should like to inquire whether he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Then I refrain from voting.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CLAY. I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I should like to know whether he has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. HARRIS. I withhold my vote.

Mr. NELSON (after having voted in the negative). I voted through inadvertence. I wish to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 4; as follows:

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to give notice that on Monday, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I will, with the consent of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], which I have obtained, call up the resolution which he has on the table, declaring certain proposed amendments to the constitution of North Carolina in contravention of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, with a view of submitting some remarks on it. I expect to go away from the city next week some time, and I shall ask that indulgence of the Senate on Monday.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that that bill may be now taken up and proceeded with. It is almost 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. That it be taken up as though it were 2 o'clock?

Mr. ALDRICH. As though it were 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the bill be now taken up as if the hour of 2 o'clock had arrived.

Mr. COCKRELL. And that it be continued when that hour comes?

Mr. ALDRICH. And that it be continued as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary will read the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Finance report as an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard; and United States notes, and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to secure the prompt and certain redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes as hereinbefore provided, to set apart in the Treasury a reserve fund of $150,000,000 in gold coin, which fund shall be used for such redemption purposes only, and whenever and as often as of said notes shall be redeemed from said fund it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to use said notes so redeemed to restore and maintain such reserve fund in the manner following, to wit: First, by exchanging the notes so redeemed for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury; second, by accepting deposits of gold coin at the Treasury or at any subtreasury in exchange for the United States notes so redeemed; third, by procuring gold coin by the use of said notes, in accordance with the provisions of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—

Mr. ALDRICH. As the amendments to the substitute are reached I ask that the Senate may adopt them by general consent. They are simply modifications of the substitute reported by the committee. They are in effect committee amendments, and I ask that they may be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. And be made a part of the substitute?

Mr. ALDRICH. And be made a part of the substitute.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that be the understanding.

Mr. TELLER. Then I understand that if the amendments to the amendment are adopted, the bill will stand as the committee want it—as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is it exactly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). The Chair will inquire whether that action was not taken yesterday?

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand that it was, and that is the reason why I make the suggestion now.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that it was, but the amended bill was printed in its present form to show the changes made. However, it is immaterial.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is immaterial, and it may be done now.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be done now, and then let the bill be reprinted.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the substitute will be amended?

Mr. TELLER. As it will be amended, so that we shall know just what the committee proposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment to the amendment, it having been reached in the reading of the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 11, line 19, after the word "restore," strike out "and maintain the same" and insert "the same to the maximum sum of $150,000,000," so as to read:

If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to restore and maintain the gold coin in the reserve fund by the foregoing methods, and the amount of such gold coin in said fund shall at any time fall below $100,000,000, then it shall be his duty to restore the same to the maximum sum of $150,000,000 by borrowing money on the credit of the United States, and for the debt thus incurred to issue and sell coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of not exceeding 3 per centum per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after one year from the date of their issue, and to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to if there is no objection. It is agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 12, line 7, after the word "authority," the committee report to amend the amendment by striking out—

And the gold coin received from the sale of said bonds shall be covered into the general fund of the Treasury and exchanged for notes which have been redeemed in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the amount of gold coin and notes in the reserve fund shall at no time exceed the maximum sum of $150,000,000—

And inserting—

And the gold coin received from the sale of said bonds shall first be covered into the general fund of the Treasury and then exchanged, in the manner hereinbefore provided, for an equal amount of the notes redeemed and held for exchange, and the United States notes exchanged in accordance with the provisions of this section shall, when covered into the Treasury, be resumed as now provided for by law, and the gold coin in the reserve fund, together with the redeemed notes held for use as provided in this section, shall at no time exceed the maximum sum of $150,000,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the substitute was proceeded with, as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury as fast as standard silver dollars are coined under the provisions of the acts of July 14, 1890, and June 13, 1898, from bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, to retire and cancel an equal amount of Treasury notes whenever received into the Treasury, either by exchange in accordance with the provisions of this act or in the ordinary course of business, and upon the cancellation of Treasury notes silver certificates shall be issued against the silver dollars so coined.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $20, and to issue gold certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20, and the coin so deposited shall be retained in the Treasury and held for the payment of such certificates on demand and used for no other purpose. Such certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued, and when held by any national banking association may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve: Provided, That whenever and so long as the gold coin held in the reserve fund in the Treasury for the redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes shall fall and remain below $100,000,000 the authority to issue certificates as herein provided shall be suspended: And provided further, That of the amount of such outstanding certificates one-fourth at least shall be in denominations of $50 or less: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, issue such certificates in denominations of $10,000, payable to order. And section 5193 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That from and after the passage of this act no United States notes or Treasury notes shall be issued or reissued of denominations less than $10, and all such outstanding notes of a lower denomination shall, whenever received at the Treasury or redeemed, be canceled and notes of denominations of $10 or upward shall be substituted therefor. No silver certificates shall be hereafter issued of a higher denomination than $10, and all such outstanding certificates of a higher denomination shall, whenever received at the Treasury or redeemed, be retired and canceled and notes of denominations of $10 or less shall be substituted therefor.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Finance report to strike out of the substitute section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any of the outstanding bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent per annum, payable February 1, 1904, and any of the bonds of the United States bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum, payable July 1, 1907, and any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum, payable August 1, 1908, and to issue in exchange therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and said bonds to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That none of such outstanding bonds shall be received in such exchange at a valuation greater than their present worth to yield an income of 2½ per cent per annum, and said bonds shall be issued at not less than par: And provided further, That such bonds when issued shall be numbered consecutively in the order of their issue, and when payment is made the last numbers issued shall be first paid, and this order shall be followed until all the bonds are paid; and whenever any of the outstanding bonds are called for payment, interest thereon shall cease three months after such call: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the difference between the present worth, computed as aforesaid, of the outstanding bonds surrendered in accordance with the provisions of this act and their par value.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any of the outstanding bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent per annum, payable February 1, 1904, and any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum, payable July 1, 1907, and any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum, payable August 1, 1908, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and said bonds to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Provided, That such outstanding bonds may be received in exchange at a valuation not greater than their present worth to yield an income of 2½ per cent per annum; and in consideration of the reduction of interest effected, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to the holders of the outstanding bonds surrendered for exchange, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum not greater than the difference between their present worth, computed as aforesaid, and their par value, and the payments to be made hereunder shall be held to be payments on account of the sinking fund created by section 3694 of the Revised Statutes: And provided further, That the 2 per cent bonds to be issued under the provisions of this act shall be issued at not less than par, and they shall be numbered consecutively in the order of their issue, and when payment is made the last numbers issued shall be first paid, and this order shall be followed until all the bonds are paid, and whenever any of the outstanding bonds are called for payment interest thereon shall cease three months after such call.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 7. That upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, by any national banking association, of any bonds of the United States in the manner provided by existing law, such association shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to the par value of the bonds so deposited; and any national banking association now having bonds on deposit for the security of circulating notes, and upon which an amount of circulating notes has been issued less than the par value of the bonds, shall be entitled, upon due application to the Comptroller of the Currency, to receive additional circulating notes in blank to an amount which will increase the circulating notes held by such association to the par value of the bonds deposited, such additional notes to be held and treated in the same way as circulating notes of national banking associations heretofore issued, and subject to all the provisions of existing law affecting such notes: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to modify or repeal the provisions of sections 5167 and 5171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to require additional deposits of bonds or of lawful money in case the market value of the bonds held to secure the circulating notes shall fall below the par value of the circulating notes outstanding for which such bonds may be deposited as security: And provided further, That the circulating notes furnished to national banking associations under the provisions of this act shall be of the denominations prescribed by law, except that no national banking association shall, after the passage of this act, be entitled to receive or to issue or reissue or place in circulation any circulating notes of a less denomination than $10: And provided further, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time of its capital stock actually paid in. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this section are hereby repealed.

SEC. 8. That every national banking association having on deposit, as provided by law, bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum to secure its circulating notes shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States in the months of January and July a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its circulating notes as are issued upon the deposit of said 3 per cent bonds, and such taxes shall be in lieu of existing taxes on its circulating notes imposed by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to affirm the existing standard of value, to maintain the parity in value of all forms of money, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment as amended, striking out the House bill after the enacting clause and substituting the bill proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will be printed in that form?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As it has been modified by amendments to the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill may be printed in that form, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I further ask that in the consideration of this bill the substitute be considered as the original bill, which will make it open to amendment in the second degree. That has been the custom.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the request?

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that in the consideration of the bill the substitute may be considered as the original bill, so that it may be open to amendment in the second degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the substitute may be treated, for purposes of amendment, as an original bill, so that it will be amendable in the first and second degree. Is there objection? If not, that will be the order of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I propose to submit at this time a brief explanation of the substitute offered to House bill No. 1 and to state some of the reasons which led a majority of the Committee on Finance to recommend its adoption by the Senate.

The general purpose of the bill is to declare anew that gold is the monetary standard of the United States; to establish confidence in the intention and ability of our Government to give the greatest possible measure of stability in value to its currency and to provide the means for securing for it at all times an equal purchasing power with gold; to lighten in every possible way the burdens imposed upon the taxpayer by existing public obligations, and to strengthen the public credit.

The first section contains a clear and definite declaration that the gold dollar is and shall continue to be the standard unit of value; a new and more emphatic pledge on the part of the United States that all forms of money it may issue or coin shall be at all times maintained at an equality of value with the gold coin adopted as the standard, and a specific provision that United States notes and Treasury notes shall, upon presentation at the Treasury, be redeemed in standard gold coin.

These several declarations embody in new and more positive terms the law and the practice in this respect as interpreted and carried out in the administration of the Treasury Department since the resumption of specie payments. The act of February 12, 1873, made the gold dollar the sole unit of value, and no serious attempt has been made in the twenty-seven years which have elapsed since that act was passed to take away from our gold coinage this important function.

It is true that the acts of February 28, 1878, and of July 14, 1890, respectively, made silver dollars and United States Treasury notes legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, but these provisions in no way affected the monetary unit of value adopted in 1873. The acts of July 14, 1890, and of November 1, 1893, both contain substantial assurances of the purpose of the United States to maintain a parity of value between its gold and silver coins. Although United States notes and Treasury notes are by law redeemable in coin, the invariable practice of the Treasury Department since 1879 has been to redeem them in gold coin.

I have recited the provisions of these several acts that it may appear that no departure is intended by this bill from the public policy which was adopted years ago and has been consistently adhered to through successive Administrations.

If the official interpretation given to the acts I have referred to had met with general acquiescence and approval, there would have been no reason for the enactment of the legislation here proposed. Unfortunately, the men who have recently taken possession of the organization of one of the great political parties persistently deny that these various laws have the force and effect which have been repeatedly given to them by Democratic and Republican Administrations alike. It is to allay the doubts which have been raised and to dispel the fears which have been aroused by the persistent antagonism of the friends of the free coinage of silver and the advocates of a silver standard to all sound monetary principles that this legislation is necessary.

In the consideration of this section I do not overlook the fact that before this discussion is over we are sure to be confronted with the charge made by Senators on the other side of the Chamber that by our reaffirmation of the gold standard we have deliberately abandoned the position which the Republican party and the country have heretofore taken in favor of international bimetalism. This charge is not in accordance with the facts.

It is true that the Republican party, through its official platform utterances, and the United States, through legislative action, have from time to time been committed to the policy of promoting an international agreement to secure the coinage of both silver and gold at a fixed ratio; but this has always been with an understanding that until such an agreement was reached the existing gold standard must be preserved. It is not necessary, and may not be profitable, to discuss at this time whether under existing conditions an international agreement of the character I have alluded to can be secured.

This question, however, is not at issue in the action which we propose. The bill now before the Senate contains no disavowal of the position heretofore taken upon the question of international bimetalism and places no obstacles in the way of its accomplishment in the future. If it is possible to secure permanence of relative value to gold and silver coins with the free coinage of both metals at a fixed ratio, this permanence can only be secured by concurrent action of all the leading commercial nations.

I regret that it seems necessary to discuss this vital question of the retention or adoption of a monetary standard from a partisan standpoint, but we are forced into that position by the attitude of the Democratic opponents of this measure. Masquerading as the friends of bimetalism, claiming to be in favor of the monetary use of both gold and silver, they have for the past four years been engaged in a crusade in behalf of the single standard of silver, in a serious attempt to place the money and business of the country upon a silver basis. It is this dangerous and continuous attack upon the public credit, constituting, as it does, a serious menace to all the great interests of the country, which demands from us an accurate restatement in the form of public law of the financial policy which has prevailed since 1879 and which met with popular approval in the elections of 1896.

We are constantly assured by the leaders of the Democratic party that the principal issue in the approaching Presidential campaign will be the question of the opening of our mints to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, without the concurrent action of other nations. The following statement was made a few days ago in another place by a distinguished member of the party:

The free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the historical ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the consent of any other nation on earth, will be the supreme issue in 1900, as it was in 1896. Upon that platform we will place Bryan and elect him. Self-seeking politicians, timorous souls, may fall away from us, but the paramount issue and the peerless candidate will remain.

There was no dissent from this statement, which was made in the presence of a number of prominent Democratic leaders, and we are sure to hear it echoed on this floor in the course of this debate.

Nosane man can be found, outside of the ranks of the small band of bold, able, and aggressive leaders who at present dominate the policy of the Democratic party, who believes for an instant that the opening of our mints to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 will raise the value of silver bullion from its current commercial price to its mint price measured with relation to gold. Outside of this Chamber there is no political economist of reputation, no writer upon the subject of money whose opinion is of value, who does not believe that the free coinage of silver by the United States at the ratio of 16 to 1, without concurrent action on the part of the great commercial nations, would be equivalent to an adoption of the silver standard for all our transactions, public and private.

The Democratic advocates of free coinage are not in any sense bimetalists, but silver monometallists of the most pronounced type. They reject all the theories upon which bimetalism can be intelligently defended, and persistently advocate a course which is sure to result in the use of silver alone as the standard of value.

It is not necessary for me to enlarge upon the evils, the loss, discredit, and disaster which are sure to follow the adoption of a silver standard by this country. If, as now seems certain, we are to have another contest between the friends of sound currency and the advocates of free silver coinage, it is fortunate for those who favor the existing status that they will be able to enter the campaign with the consciousness that all the pledges made by them in 1896 have been fully redeemed and that the monetary issues between the parties are at last clearly defined.

The second section provides for a reserve fund of $150,000,000 in gold to secure the prompt and certain redemption of outstanding United States and Treasury notes. This fund is increased fifty millions over that which is now held by the Treasury for redemption purposes. The reason for this is found in the rapidly increasing amount of notes and certificates which, under existing pledges for the maintenance of the parity of value, are directly or indirectly a burden upon the fund.

In 1882, the year in which the amount of the reserve fund was fixed by implication at $100,000,000, the amount of United States notes, silver certificates, and currency certificates in circulation was $380,000,000, and the reserve fund 26 per cent of this amount. On November 1, 1899, the amount of United States notes, Treasury notes, and certificates outstanding was $815,000,000, and a reserve fund of $150,000,000 would be but 18 per cent of this amount. In 1882 the total amount of notes and certificates, including national-bank notes, outstanding was $732,000,000, and the reserve fund was 13½ per cent of this total amount. On November 1, 1899, the total amount of notes and certificates, including national-bank notes, outstanding was $1,054,000,000, and a reserve fund of $150,000,000 would be 14 per cent of this amount. It will be seen by these figures that it is proposed to increase the amount of the reserve fund only in proportion to the increase in outstanding notes and certificates, and it is believed by the committee that the amount named is not greater than that required for redemption purposes.

That this amount of $150,000,000 can be held without embarrassment to the Treasury will be evident when we consider that the total amount of gold in the Treasury on the 1st of November, 1899, exclusive of the amount held to pay gold certificates, was $252,000,000, and the available cash balance, including the gold reserve, was $289,000,000.

This section makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to replenish the reserve fund from time to time by the use of the notes redeemed. This he may do by exchanging the notes for any gold in the general fund of the Treasury, or any which may be deposited at the Treasury or at any subtreasury; or he may use the notes for securing gold coin under the provisions of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes.

In case all of these methods shall fail and the gold in the fund shall fall below one hundred millions, then it becomes his duty to sell United States bonds, the proceeds to be used to restore the fund to the maximum amount by paying the gold so obtained into the general fund of the Treasury and then exchanging for it an equal amount of notes which have been redeemed from the reserve fund.

The committee, having in view the rapid increase in the gold production of the world and the equally rapid increase in the available stock of gold in this country, are of the opinion that it will not be at any time necessary to sell bonds under the provisions of this section. Conditions have entirely changed since the bond issues of 1894-95 were made necessary by deficiencies in the revenues and an artificially stimulated demand upon the Treasury gold.

The gold production of the world in 1894 was $181,175,600; that of 1898 was $287,428,600. The gold coin in circulation in the United States at the close of the fiscal year 1896, as estimated by the Director of the Mint, was $454,905,064, while at the close of the fiscal year 1898 it was $657,950,463, or an increase in two years of more than $200,000,000. In the five years from 1893 to 1898 European holdings of gold in banks and treasuries increased more than $600,000,000, and at the present moment the only considerable demand for gold for monetary use comes from India.

It must be evident from these statements, and the further fact that the world's production of gold is certain to increase even more rapidly in the future than it has in the recent past, that there will be no difficulty in securing by use of notes the gold which will be necessary to maintain the fund at its maximum amount, which amount the committee are clearly of the opinion is not larger than is necessary to command public confidence in the unquestioned ability of the Government to maintain the parity of value of all forms of money in circulation.

It is true we do not propose to make all outstanding notes and certificates a direct burden upon the gold reserve. National-bank notes, through the method of their redemption in lawful money, are indirectly a burden upon the fund, and so, in a certain sense, are silver certificates and silver dollars.

In considering questions affecting the adequacy and use of the gold reserve, we are bound to inquire into the ability of the Treasury to maintain an equality of value between the silver dollar and silver certificate and the gold dollar without provision for direct exchangeability. Our own experience and that of other countries, notably France and Germany, clearly prove that it is possible to keep in circulation at a parity of value with gold a large but limited amount of legal-tender silver or notes based upon such silver without any provision for a compulsory redemption in gold.

The amount of silver certificates in circulation on the 1st of December, 1899, was $394,292,800 and of standard silver dollars $78,232,454, a total of $472,525,254. This amount will be gradually increased by the silver coinage which will take place under the provisions of the act of June 13, 1898. Both silver dollars and silver certificates are by law receivable for all public dues, and as long as the ordinary receipts of the Government are more than $600,000,000 per annum it is very evident that silver certificates are not likely to go to a discount. The Government itself, in the absence of a positive injunction, would be bound to maintain the value of this form of currency through the ordinary business channels of exchange for self-protection.

By the provisions of the pending substitute all outstanding notes and certificates of a less denomination than $10 are to be withdrawn from circulation and silver certificates issued in their place. The amount of paper currency of denominations of $1, $2, and $5 in circulation on the 30th of November, 1899, was $391,340,138. It will be seen that these denominations practically absorb the entire amount of outstanding silver certificates and will give to silver notes a secure place in our currency system.

The committee believe that under these conditions, or, in fact, under any which are likely to arise, there will be no difficulty in maintaining a parity without directing the Secretary to exchange silver dollars for gold at the demand of the holder of the silver. They believe, in fact, that no public interests will be served by the adoption of a legislative provision for such an exchange. To make all our silver currency a direct charge upon the gold reserve might imperil at a critical time the sufficiency of that fund. We fear it would serve as an invitation for unfriendly drafts upon the Treasury resources.

The committee do not suggest any changes in the status of the silver dollar or the silver certificate. We do not propose to take away from silver any of the monetary privileges or prerogatives which it now enjoys. In fact, we believe that the legislation suggested will greatly strengthen its position in our monetary system.

The third section makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as fast as standard silver dollars are coined, as required by law, from the bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, to retire and cancel an equal amount of Treasury notes, and provides that upon the cancellation of the notes silver certificates shall be issued against the silver dollars so coined.

In the absence of a provision of this kind a large amount of silver dollars are held in the Treasury, nominally for the redemption of Treasury notes. As these notes are not presented to the Treasury for such redemption, there is no method by which they can be promptly retired and silver certificates issued in their place. This section makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire and cancel the notes received into the Treasury in the ordinary course of business as well as those presented for redemption.

The fourth section authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to receive deposits of gold coin and to issue gold certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20. The provisions of this section are in most respects the same as those contained in the twelfth section of the act of July 13, 1892. The differences are as follows:

First. The section suggested makes a more specific pledge that the coin deposited shall be held for the payment of such certificates on demand. It also provides that it shall be used for no other purpose.

Second. It provides more clearly that the suspension of the authority to issue such certificates shall continue only during the time that the gold reserve remains below $100,000,000.

Third. It provides that of the amount of certificates outstanding at any time one-fourth at least shall be of denominations of $50 or less.

Fourth. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion to issue gold certificates in denominations of $10,000, payable to order. These certificates are intended to take the place of currency certificates now issued in accordance with the terms of section 5193 of the Revised Statutes, and this section is to be repealed. The Secretary of the Treasury called the attention of the committee to the fact that the currency against which currency certificates are issued is held at the various subtreasuries at considerable risk to the Government. The issuance of these certificates was authorized principally for the convenience of banks, and these institutions would be equally well served by the issue of gold certificates as recommended.

The purpose of the section as a whole is to give certain and active monetary use to the large and rapidly increasing amount of gold in the country. With the habits of our people and their preference for the use of paper currency wherever possible instead of gold and silver coin, this seems to be the most effective means of keeping in active circulation the gold coinage, which is certain in the future to be a more and more important element of our currency.

The fifth section provides that no United States notes or Treasury notes shall hereafter be issued or reissued in denominations of less than $10, and all such notes of a smaller denomination, whenever redeemed, shall be canceled and notes of $10 or upward substituted therefor. It also provides that no silver certificates of a higher denomination than $10 shall be issued.

Taken in connection with the last part of the seventh section, the effect of the legislation suggested would be to withdraw from circulation all outstanding notes and all certificates (except silver) of denominations less than $10 and to issue in their place silver certificates. I have already stated, in my explanation of the provisions of the second section, the reasons which led the committee to suggest this course.

The sixth section gives to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to convert a portion of the national debt into bonds bearing 2 per cent interest. The proposition contemplates a profitable anticipation of interest payments and consequent reduction of the public debt. The transaction may be considered first as a mathematical question of profits, and second as a question of policy affecting the public credit.

The total interest-bearing debt of the United States on the 1st of December, 1899, was $1,037,012,420, with an annual interest charge of $39,960,442.60. Of this amount $97,402,300 were of 5 per cent bonds, payable February 1, 1904; $553,251,500 of 4 per cent bonds, payable July 1, 1907; $198,678,720 of 3 per cent bonds, payable August 1, 1908; $162,315,400 of 4 per cent bonds, payable February 1, 1925, and $25,364,500 of extended 2 per cent bonds, payable at the option of the United States.

The proposition recommended by the committee is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convert the 5 per cent bonds due in 1904, the 4 per cent bonds due in 1907, and the 3 per cent bonds due in 1908, amounting in the aggregate to $849,332,520, into 2 per cent bonds, payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years. On these three classes of bonds there is at present an annual interest charge of $32,960,536.60.

If the entire amount should be converted into the new 2 per cents, the annual interest charge would be $16,986,650.40, showing an annual saving by conversion of $15,973,886.20. The Government will be obliged to pay on the three classes of bonds mentioned in interest up to the maturity of the bonds at existing rates $237,021,423. After conversion the amount required to pay interest up to maturity at the proposed rate of 2 per cent would be $125,048,760, showing a total reduction of interest by the conversion of $111,972,663.

In order to induce the holders of the outstanding bonds to consent to the conversion proposed, and in consideration of the reduction of interest effected thereby, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to them in exchange a sum not greater than the present worth of such bonds, computed to yield an income of 2½ per cent per annum and their par value.

The maximum rate which the Secretary would be authorized to pay for the exchange on each of the classes of bonds, respectively, on the 1st of January, 1899, would be, on the 4 per cents, due in 1907, 12.046 per cent; on the 5 per cents, due in 1904, 10.700 per cent, and on the 3 per cents, due in 1908, 5.839 per cent. The aggregate amount which would be paid under these provisions in case the entire amount of bonds was converted would be, upon the 4 per cents, due in 1907, $66,645,782; on the 5 per cents, due in 1904, $10,421,923, and on the 3 per cents, due in 1908, $11,601,248, or a total possible payment upon all classes of bonds of $88,668,953.

If this entire sum should be paid and be deducted from the saving in interest as shown above, there would still be a net profit to the Government, by the conversion, of $23,303,710. Considered, then, simply from the standpoint of a profit to the Government, the desirability of the exchange is established beyond question.

The surplus in the Treasury over and above the amount required for an adequate working balance and for the reserve fund created by this bill would allow the Secretary to pay without difficulty the $88,000,000 which would be required to effect this reduction of interest.

In fact, under present conditions and with the necessity confronting us of more promptly turning current receipts back into the channels of business, the payments suggested would afford welcome relief from dangerous congestion.

With a transaction that promises such satisfactory results so far as profits are concerned, we are bound to inquire closely whether there is anything in its details or conditions that conflicts with the traditional policy of the country in its treatment of the public debt.

The people of the United States for a century have been unwilling to consent to anything which looked like a perpetuation of the national debt. Wise public policy dictates that we should always, as far as possible, keep the payment of our obligations within our own control in order that we may be able to economically apply any surplus revenues we may have from time to time to the reduction of the debt, looking forward to its ultimate extinction.

It is true that the proposition contained in this section postpones the date at which the Government may exercise its option to redeem the bonds, but this will not, in the opinion of the committee, have the effect of placing this portion of the national debt beyond the control of the Government. The bonds are to be issued at par, and it is impossible for us to foresee any circumstances or conditions which will cause a 2 per cent bond to be sold at any considerable premium.

It seems clear to us that a bond which will remain substantially at par throughout its existence is more desirable than any other, not only to the Government, but to a large class of investors. The question of premiums is always a difficult one to deal with. A debt can only be reduced by the application of surplus revenues and these can be used just as economically in the purchase of a bond in the open market at par as by a redemption of the same amount of indebtedness at maturity.

From this standpoint the rate of interest which the bonds shall bear, supposing it to be low enough to prevent the bonds from largely appreciating in value, is more important than the length of time which the bonds have to run. Considerations of this nature have led other countries to issue securities in the form of perpetual annuities, with no time fixed for their redemption. In cases of this kind where the annual payments are low the securities were originally issued at less than par, and sell in the market at a considerable discount. Even the British 3 per cent consols reached par but four times in the century from 1789 to 1889.

While there is universal assent to the proposition that the debt-paying policy of the United States is a wise one and should be persisted in, it is impossible to state with any degree of accuracy how rapidly it will be possible for us to reduce our indebtedness. The sinking fund requires the payment of about $50,000,000 per annum, and it is not at all likely that in the near future we shall be able to reduce the debt more rapidly than this. All of us were impressed with the idea in 1892-93 that the national debt was soon to be extinguished; but by processes and for reasons which it is not necessary for me to enlarge upon, it unexpectedly increased from $585,037,100 in 1893 to $1,037,012,420 on the 1st of December, 1899.

We trust that our expenditures will soon be on a peace footing, but we must realize that we shall have large disbursements for some time to come, which it may not be possible to pay from the current revenues. For instance, there is a general belief that we are soon to build an interoceanic canal, which will involve an expenditure of, say, $150,000,000. In the development of the vast resources of our country, meaning to include in this phrase our new possessions, it may not be unreasonable to suppose that payments will be necessary for public purposes in excess of our present estimates. Coincident with this natural tendency to an increase of expenses we shall have to meet an emphatic demand for a reduction or repeal of some of the more onerous of our war taxes.

In considering the possibilities of the future we can not overlook the fact that the national debts of the world have increased at an astonishing rate. In 1863 the aggregate of the national debts of the world was about thirteen thousand million dollars and in 1892 thirty-one thousand millions. Notwithstanding all these uncertainties, we are bound, however, as prudent legislators to so arrange our affairs that we can apply our surplus revenues at any time promptly and economically to the reduction of our outstanding obligations, and this can be done under the terms of the pending measure.

In the minds of the committee the serious question is not whether the conversion authorized by this section would prove a profitable transaction to the Government—on this point they apprehend there is no doubt—but whether the holders of the outstanding bonds would be willing to make the exchange upon the terms authorized. We could not expect to dispose of a 2 per cent bond at par under usual conditions. We can not expect an investor to give up a security paying a given rate of interest and accept one paying a much lower rate unless he had some controlling motive to induce him to make the exchange. We offer the holder of outstanding bonds the inducement of an obligation payable, principal and interest, specifically in gold coin and a security for a long term in place of one maturing in a short time.

This extension gives an important element of value to the new security. It has been found desirable—in fact, necessary—in all the great refunding operations of the past to give to new securities a longer and more certain tenure than those which have been refunded. For instance, by far the most important refunding operation of recent times was the conversion of British 3 per cent consols in 1888. These securities amounted, in round numbers, to more than two thousand five hundred million dollars; they were redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after one year's notice. In issuing the new consols the Government was obliged to relinquish the right of redemption for a period of thirty-five years and to agree to pay 2½ per cent for fifteen years up to 1903 and then 2½ per cent for twenty years up to 1923.

There are a variety of circumstances which make the present an auspicious time to refund the public debt. In recent years there has been a gradual appreciation in the prices of high-class securities throughout the world. This movement has been more marked in the United States than elsewhere. The increasing demand for our bonds has given to these securities an exceptionally strong position in the world's market. Take the fours of 1907 as an example. The prices at which they have sold in the past five months have realized to investors the following rates: August, 2.195 per cent; September, 2.222 per cent; October, 2.255 per cent; November, 2.206 per cent; December, 2.005 per cent. It is evident from these quotations that the credit of the United States is even now approximating a 2 per cent basis.

We believe it is impossible to overestimate the advantage which would accrue to the United States from placing its national debt upon a 2 per cent basis and keeping its obligations, issued at this rate, at par in the markets of the world. If all the bonds which have been issued since 1893 had been sold at par on the basis proposed in this bill the sum saved in interest to the maturity of the bonds would have been nearly $150,000,000. The public securities of Great Britain, the creditor nation of the world, are selling to-day practically on a 2½ per cent basis. The obligations of all the other nations, which are in any sense commercial or industrial rivals of the United States, sell at prices which realize much higher rates. The following are the quotations of the securities of the principal European nations in London on December 9, 1899:

Austrian gold fours	97 to 99
Dutch two-and-a-halfs	80 to 82
French rentes, threes	98 to 100
German imperial loan, threes	98 to 99
Prussian consols, three-and-a-halfs	97 to 99
Italian fives	93½ to 94½
Swedish threes	85 to 87
Russian threes	101½ to 102½
British consols, 2½ to 1903, then 2½ to 1923	99 to 100
British two-and-a-halfs, 1905

By the provisions of this bill we remove all possible doubts and apprehensions as to the character of our monetary standard and make it clear to the world that we intend under all circumstances to keep all forms of our currency equal in value with gold, and it would be a source of national pride if we could, in addition to this great achievement, place the credit of the United States on a higher plane than is occupied by that of any other country.

One of the most potent influences for securing the successful consummation of the plan proposed will, we anticipate, be found in the active cooperation of the national banks. The demand from the banks will establish a market for the bonds and fix a price at not less than par for other purchasers. It may not be possible to measure the effect which the constant demand of the banks for our securities in the past has exerted in sustaining their prices, but it must be quite evident that without this influence our bonds would have sold at lower rates.

One of the reasons which led the committee to recommend this plan of conversion was that the bonds suggested would be much more desirable as a basis for national-bank note circulation than the outstanding securities. The high premium at which outstanding bonds are held renders their use as a basis for bank circulation unprofitable. When we consider that we have more than $600,000,000 of capital in the national banks and but little more than $200,000,000 of note circulation, and this with a strong demand for an increase of currency, we are led to the conclusion that some action should be taken to allow the national banks to increase their note circulation.

With high-priced bonds and the amount of issue limited to 90 per cent of their par value, note circulation can not be profitable, and it is likely to be unprofitable whenever there is an unusual demand for money and in localities where the rate of interest is above the normal average. If a bank can buy a 2 per cent bond at par and issue an amount of currency equal to the purchase price of the bonds, it is very evident that, without reference to the rate at which it may loan its money, it can make a profit upon circulation of 2 per cent per annum, less the amount of taxes and the expenses incident to the redemption of its notes.

According to the Treasury Department's estimate, with taxes and expenses deducted, the net profit on circulation under this bill with 2 per cent bonds for security would be 1.437 per cent per annum. If we contrast this with the uncertain profit of one-fourth of 1 per cent per annum now realized on circulation based on 4 per cent bonds, we can feel sure that the banks will take a conservative view of their own interests and give the Government their active cooperation in the work of exchange. In the light of experience, the profit which would accrue under the new bonds is not excessive.

With the profits on circulation small or uncertain, we have had a constantly diminishing amount of note issues. The banks have been unable to respond to increasing demands for currency, as they should be able to do under normal conditions and as I believe they will be able to do if this bill becomes a law. A very wide divergence of opinion has been developed recently as to the terms and conditions under which banks should be permitted to issue circulating notes. This divergence has been so wide that there is general acquiescence in the conviction that it will not now be possible to secure the adoption of any plan of currency reform which involves a change in the basis of bank circulation.

Under these circumstances it is the duty of Congress, in the public interest, to so modify the national banking act as to give to banking associations an opportunity to issue currency with a reasonable profit. If the provisions of this bill are enacted into law, we may expect a considerable increase in the national-bank note circulation in the near future, and there is no reason, if the business of the country demands it, why in time the outstanding circulation should not equal the capitalization of the banks.

The seventh section provides that upon the deposit of United States bonds by any national banking association in the manner provided by law such association shall be entitled to receive circulating notes equal to the par value of the bonds deposited. It also provides that any national banking association now having bonds on deposit shall be entitled to the same privilege. The Senate has upon several occasions passed bills for this purpose practically without opposition, and I shall assume that it is not necessary to restate the obvious reasons which have led the committee to renew their recommendation.

The eighth section provides that any national banking association having on deposit as security for its circulating notes bonds of the United States bearing interest at 2 per cent per annum shall pay a tax upon such circulating notes of one-half of 1 per cent annually instead of the tax of 1 per cent now imposed by law. We believe this reduction in taxation is necessary to encourage national banks to increase their circulation, and it will undoubtedly have the effect of promoting the conversion of bonds provided for in the sixth section.

By the enactment of the provisions of this bill into law the solemn pledge which was the moving force in a great political campaign is redeemed. In the light of the promises of certainty and security, which this bill will fulfill, we have already entered upon an era of unexampled industrial and commercial growth and prosperity. Its final adoption will give new activity to the enterprise of our people and broaden and deepen the currents of our national life. It will dispel all fears of possible disturbance of our currency system through antagonistic administrative action. It will give added value to our securities of all kinds in foreign or domestic markets. It will have an important influence in the further development of our rapidly increasing foreign trade, as it will enable us to enter the contest for the world's markets on more favorable terms.

That the policy of this bill will meet with popular approval there can be no doubt. The cause of sound money is vastly stronger now than it was in 1896. Every contention then made by our opponents in regard to the effect of the retention of the gold standard or the continued rejection of the silver standard has been proved by the logic of events to be unfounded. If Democratic leaders and their allies, old or new, see fit to make the free coinage of silver and antagonism to the policy embodied in this bill the issue of another political contest and renew their destructive attacks upon public interests, they will find that their defeat of 1896 will but faintly suggest the character of the disaster which will overtake them in 1900.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 8, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 4, 1900.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL.

Frank Simmons, of Alabama, to be marshal of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, to which position he was temporarily appointed September 16, 1897, during a recess of the Senate, and nominated to the same position on December 18, 1897; but Congress having adjourned without taking action as to his confirmation, he was again appointed July 9, 1898, during a recess of the Senate. On December 13, 1898, Mr. Simmons was again nominated to the position above named, and, failing of confirmation, was again temporarily appointed on March 4, 1899, during a recess of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents the following privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order, please.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken, and the House will be in order.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Clerk will read the resolution as it will read when amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks for the reading of the resolution as amended.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the paper I send to the desk will help the Clerk, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as it will be when amended.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. Does my colleague desire any time?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, as the introducer of the original resolution I accept the amendments. I do not desire to debate the matter now. I am anxious the resolution should pass so that we can speedily get all the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. Well.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PAYNE. There is a clerical error in the third part of the resolution. It reads "customs-house." The letter "s" should be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made. There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will yield me five minutes. I want to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. LEVY. Allow me to offer the following amendment, which I think will be germane:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the House of Representatives his reasons for the delay in making such deposits in the national banks until a financial panic had been reached.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, that perhaps may be in order when this resolution is passed, after we get the information from the Secretary of the Treasury, but not until then. I shall not yield for an amendment of that kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman wants five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, in the month of September the reserve of the banks in the city of New York ran down. I warned the Secretary of the Treasury at that time. He failed to heed my warning until after this panic took place. The cause of all this depression in the city of New York and the United States has been taxation and the absorption by the Treasury of the United States of the internal-revenue collections. If the Secretary of the Treasury had come to the relief of the banks in the month of September or October instead of buying bonds, there would have been no panic in this country. That is why I offer this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York that he can not offer this amendment on yielded time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to yield to his colleague [Mr. LEVY] for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I did not.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or such of the subcommittee as they may designate, shall have leave to sit during the session of the House during the Fifty-sixth Congress and during the recess.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what recess he refers to?

Mr. CANNON. The ordinary recess that Congress agrees to through the session. In the short session it is necessary for the committee to sit through the recess.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING IN THE RECORD.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from the National Brewers' Association, and ask unanimous consent to have it read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri presents a petition from the National Brewers' Association and asks that it be read and printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object. I do not want to lumber up the RECORD.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following appointments as Regents of the Smithsonian Institution: ROBERT R. HITT of Illinois; ROBERT ADAMS, JR., of Pennsylvania; HUGH A. DINSMORE of Arkansas.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. FARIS for three days, on account of important business.

And then (at 12 o'clock and 17 minutes), on motion of Mr. PAYNE, the House, in accordance with its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 8, at 12 o'clock meridian.

"Senate joint resolution No. 6, relative to the construction of navy-yards and shipbuilding.

"Whereas the United States has expended for plants and sites for navy-yards and stations more than $100,000,000. The expenditure of this vast amount of public money was made that the nation might have under its immediate control a number of navy-yards and stations conveniently located and properly equipped, where it could build, repair, and equip its ships of war. We now have at least three navy-yards that are equal to any demand which may be made upon them. One of these is located in California, namely, Mare Island Navy-Yard. Notwithstanding that the nation has its own navy-yards fully equipped, the policy pursued by those in charge of the Navy Department has been to give the building of the Navy to private establishments. Such a policy is neither wise nor economical, and is directly opposite that followed by all of the great naval powers of the world. England and France never lose sight of the interest of the dockyards of the nation; they keep the dockyards always full of work, even if the private establishments of the country be forced to remain idle. We believe that it is both wise and patriotic to assist the development of private enterprise to the fullest possible degree, having a due regard to the public good. We condemn any policy that will favor private enterprise to the total neglect of the public dockyards of the country, as we would equally oppose the total neglect or discouragement of private enterprise by having all work required for our Navy done in the navy-yard. We believe that both should be encouraged and assisted, so that in time of great emergency the country would find it possible to have its work done in either or both places with dispatch. We favor the encouragement and building up of our navy-yards because it is the best possible safeguard the country can have against the formation of trusts or combines in shipbuilding. It also will be the means of securing under the control of the Navy Department a trained corps of mechanics who can be relied upon at all times. England, the greatest naval power in existence, almost entirely relies on her dockyards for the construction of her ships of war. To such a state of perfection has the dockyard system of England been brought that the Board of Admiralty can estimate almost to a dollar the cost of the heaviest battle ship, and to a day as to the time needed for its construction. She has demonstrated beyond a doubt that the cheapest and quickest and most economical place to have her war ships constructed is in her dockyards. We believe that what England has been able to do in this line we can do, if the proper encouragement be given. Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives therein be requested and urged to have inserted in the present naval appropriation bill a provision providing that a fair proportion of the vessels provided for in that bill shall be constructed in the navy-yards of the country and that at least one of them be constructed at Mare Island Navy-Yard. We also call their attention to the fact that all the ships provided for in the naval appropriation bill for the fiscal year of 1897 and 1898 have not been contracted for nor assigned, and we hope that they may use their influence with the Navy Department to have some portion of them built at Mare Island.

"Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be requested to immediately transmit to each of said Senators and Representatives a copy of these resolutions."

The above resolution was unanimously adopted January 26, 1899, and the Vallesjo Board of Trade would respectfully ask our Representatives in Congress to do all in their power to bring about the recommendations therein contained.

Respectfully, yours,

W. T. KELLEY,
President Vallesjo Board of Trade.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. By direction of the Committee on the Census I report a bill and ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the power and authority conferred upon the Director of the Census by an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1899, said Director of the Census shall have power and is hereby authorized to appoint and employ, as the necessity therefor may arise, 1 purchasing agent, at an annual salary of $2,500; 2 chiefs of division, at an annual salary of $2,000 each; five clerks of class 1; six clerks of class 2, and eight clerks of class 3; to employ such number of special agents, not exceeding 35 in all, as may be proper and necessary for the purpose of gathering any information or data in relation to, or required by, the agricultural schedules; to employ special agents to assist the supervisors in large cities, whenever he may deem it proper, in connection with the work of preparation for, or during the progress of, the enumeration, or in connection with the reenumeration of any district or a part thereof; to employ as special agents such of the supervisors of census as he may deem wise and proper, at the compensation provided for in section 17 of said act, the intent and purpose being that the supervisors of census may be appointed special agents at the time they are acting as supervisors and receive the compensation to which they are entitled as supervisors and also as special agents; and the Director of the Census is hereby specifically authorized to pay such supervisors for their services as special agents the compensation which he may authorize out of any general or special appropriation which may be made for the payment of special agents, and to allow any supervisor of census, in addition to the contingencies provided for in section 11 of said act, actual and necessary traveling expenses and an allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $3 per day during his necessary absence from his usual place of residence in connection with the work of preparation for the enumeration; to allow, in fixing the compensation of enumerators, not more than 5 cents for each death reported; to purchase any and all law books, books of reference, and periodicals which may be required from time to time in the Census Office, and pay for the same out of the sum appropriated by the said act of March 3, 1899, or any other appropriation hereafter made for the census work, whether there be a specific authorization for such purposes or not; Provided, That the aggregate amount of such purchases shall not exceed the sum of $2,000.

Sec. 2. That in addition to the other statistics required to be collected by section 7 of said act, approved March 3, 1899, there shall be collected on the agricultural schedules information concerning the number and kinds of live stock not on farms, and the Director of the Census shall have power to pay the enumerators for collecting such information, in his discretion, not less than 5 nor more than 10 cents for each barn or inclosure visited in which such live stock may be found: Provided, however, That the Director of the Census may appoint special agents to gather the information required by this section whenever he may deem it proper.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are a good many important provisions in that bill, and we have had no opportunity to compare it with the existing law. So far as I can judge, a good many of the provisions are wise and prudent, but I ask that the bill may be placed on the Calendar and printed. I will assist the Senator, as soon as I have had time to investigate it, in having it called up and passed at an early day.

Mr. CARTER. I will later in the day file a report to accompany the bill, the report giving an explanation of the necessity of each provision referred to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report has been presented?

Mr. CARTER. The report will be filed later.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask if there is any provision in the bill for ascertaining the distribution of wealth, or if there is such a provision in any of the census acts which we have passed.

Mr. CARTER. There is no method provided for ascertaining the distribution of wealth, save and except such information as would be collected in connection with the agricultural and manufacturing schedules.

I will say to the Senator, in that behalf, that the committee has recently been strongly importuned to depart from a policy established in connection with the legislation passed last spring. It will be borne in mind that the reports of the Eleventh Census were not published until from three to eight years after the enumeration had taken place. It is universally conceded that in this rapid-moving age statistical matter eight years old is of very little practical value.

We undertook in the act under which the present census will be taken to confine inquiries to four essential propositions, essential because requiring a house-to-house canvass by the enumerators in order to get all the necessary facts. Those four headings are population, agriculture, manufacturing, vital statistics and mortality.

We were urged at the time the bill was under consideration in the committee, and have been since most strenuously urged, to import into the work of the census which is to commence on the 1st day of next June inquiries concerning a large number of facts and circumstances varying in importance because of the special interest that particular persons take in them.

The inquiry referred to by the Senator from South Dakota, relative to the distribution of wealth, would be of very great gratification to many and of value to all persons. But if that particular feature were imported into the work of the census, other features, apparently of quite as great significance, could with equal force be urged upon the enumerators.

Within the past week the committee has been urged and importuned by most estimable citizens of high standing in this District and throughout the country to extend the enumeration inquiries on the schedules to the feeble-minded, the dumb, the deaf, the blind, the criminal classes; and imperialists I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] would suggest as an additional inquiry. But the committee has, notwithstanding, declined to embark upon this wide and shoreless sea.

I make this explanation for the benefit of the Senator from South Dakota and others who may think it necessary to add to the census work.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to give notice of an amendment. I suppose from what has been said that the bill will not be voted upon to-day.

Mr. CARTER. It will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to give notice now of an amendment which I shall offer when the bill comes up for consideration.

I see the very great force and wisdom of the reasons which have been stated by the Senator from Montana. I have no desire to contravene the policy of the committee, but there is one particular on which I think Senators from all parts of the country will agree. It is really but an extension of the clause in regard to manufactures. I should like to have it a little more specifically stated, so as to have some official who shall tabulate and put in scientific form statistics in regard to the water power of the country.

It is well known that the manufacturing of the country is moving from its old home in the Northeast and spreading itself all over the United States. Although I myself represent a community which is almost entirely given to manufacturing and to such branches of business as are attendant upon manufacturing in supplying the wants of persons engaged in manufacturing, yet

I heartily welcome, and I believe my constituents heartily welcome, that change. They expect to engage cheerfully and hopefully in the emulation and competition which this new condition of things will produce; and if they can not hold their own, what is now their own will pass to somebody else without a murmur on our part.

I have had occasion to make a very careful examination of some questions connected with this matter, and it is very important indeed to the persons who are proposing to institute new manufacturing or to continue old manufacturing all over the country that the knowledge in regard to the water power of the country shall be made public, and be made public now. I have been amazed to find how little information there is on this subject in the old census. There is one tabulation of a portion of the statistics.

It will not be a very expensive or extensive inquiry. I presume that an official with a salary of $5,000, with the instrumentalities already provided, would be enough to give this important information. I hope the committee will regard it as rather belonging to the statistics in regard to manufacturing, which they do provide for, than as an introduction of a new policy. At any rate, I shall move that amendment to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not wish to discuss the measure; but I desire to give notice that I shall offer an amendment for the purpose of gathering statistics with regard to the distribution of wealth. I do not think that ought to delay the report. I will try to so frame the amendment that the work, simply by the addition of more force and a larger appropriation, can be gotten out at the earliest possible day. It seems to me that there can be no more important subject discussed and investigated than the question, Who reaps the benefit of the toil of the laborers of this country?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the whole question is precisely as stated by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Montana. What the committee has tried to do is to avoid the blunders of the old censuses. We have tried to get what I may call a quick census, an enumeration covering, as the Senator has said, population, manufacturing, agriculture, and vital statistics. All the great domain lying outside of these the committee kept out of the first immediate census, but have provided that the Census Office, which is to be a continuing one, shall go on with special agents appointed by the Director and get at the facts on these other questions.

Now, if you add anything, if you disturb the schedules which are already made and which are confined to the subjects covered by the original bill, you open the door wide. The committee in their sessions at this Congress have felt like appealing to the Senate to stand by them on their proposition to have a quick census.

So far as the Senate goes, I had charge of this matter both for 1890 and the previous census, and it became very burdensome and irksome work to me to continually ask that the time of the census should be extended and that the expense of the census should be added to. At last, with a great cumbersome work covering twenty-two or twenty-three volumes, which it took eight or nine years to collect and get published, everybody lost all interest in the census of 1890. The same was true in regard to the census of 1880. Now we are trying to cure that, and we are beset by everybody who wants special information in which he is interested. I should like to see information concerning water power put in. My State is full of it.

Mr. TELLER. To what does the Senator refer?

Mr. HALE. To the statistics as to water power, as to the streams, as to the extent of the power to carry machinery, the places upon which mills can be built. No one is more interested in that question than I and my colleague, representing the State of Maine. But it will not be so small a work as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks if it is embodied in the first census. If all that the Senator desires is that the Census Bureau shall take up this subject and by special agents see that the work is done, and report as early as possible, to that I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. That is all.

Mr. HALE. That we provide for in section 8.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think you do.

Mr. HALE. If we do not, it can easily be put in the bill. That there is no objection to whatever.

Mr. HOAR. It would be all right then.

Mr. HALE. But if you clog and lumber the immediate first census with subjects such as that indicated by the Senator from South Dakota, if you do not end the work when it ought to be ended, if you do not end the publication when it ought to be ended and begin to extend in the future as we have done in the past, men will forget before the volumes come out that there has been a census taken.

When the bill comes up to-morrow, as I understand the chairman is to call it up, I hope the Senate will stand by the committee in trying to make this a great, rapid, immediate work, where the results for the public will be rapid and immediate.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, who has had connection with this matter, a question for information. What particular subjects are to be presented first? What are regarded as the most important that are to come out early?

Mr. HALE. Those that relate nearest to what was the object of the very first census in the history of mankind, simply the taking of the heads.

Mr. TELLER. Population?

Mr. HALE. Population. That is first. Then manufactures; then agriculture; then the vital and mortality statistics. All those four can be comprehended in four or five volumes, and all can be got out within two years from the time when the work commences. Those volumes will answer the questions of nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand of the people in the United States who want information. Then, by section 8 we provide that the Census Office shall go on and with its special agents make inquiries into these other subjects-matter, and from time to time report to Congress.

Mr. TELLER. I only want to say that I hope the committee will not abandon the general character of the census heretofore.

Mr. HALE. No; it does not.

Mr. TELLER. But I think there is great necessity of haste in bringing out those important features. When they are once before the public other information can be brought out which it is quite immaterial as to whether it comes out a year earlier or a year later. They are things that are relative, and it does not make any difference whether we get the information this year or five years afterwards, because we know what the relation is of one to another, and we know that that relation will probably continue. But the statistics of population, manufactures, etc., everybody would like to get at the earliest possible date, and if the Census Department will give their attention to those first and let these other matters lie for the present there will be no difficulty in getting out the census report in a reasonable time.

Mr. HALE. That is just what the bill provides for. The committee had precisely that in mind and stipulates in the bill that the Director shall not give his attention to the other subjects-matter until he has completed the actual census.

Mr. TELLER. I have not read the bill, but I am glad to know that that is the character of it. I had some little to do with the closing up of one census, and I found the great trouble had been that all these things had been going on at once, instead of the most important being selected and the others deferred. I think, if the committee have presented a bill of that kind, it is meritorious.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. ALLISON. I believe this matter has passed from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to make a single remark.

Mr. ALLISON. On this subject?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina will proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the chairman or the Senator from Maine if it is not a fact brought out before the Census Committee when the recent law was being framed that the schedules first taken in the last census were so multifarious and covered so many subjects that the Census Office was in the seventh or eighth year still trying to tackle it and condense it for use and publication, and had at last to throw away a large mass of material that had cost perhaps half a million or a million dollars in the effort to get facts that were of no value after they were obtained? If we are now to cover all the earth in the effort to get statistics, the material will grow very stale and old before it can be tabulated.

Mr. CARTER. And Senators as well, possibly, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introduction of bills is in order.

Mr. CARTER subsequently submitted a report to accompany the bill.

MEDIATION IN TRANSVAAL WAR.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read at length and lie upon the table, as I wish to call it up at some future day and to make some remarks in regard to it.

The joint resolution (S. R. 56) authorizing the United States Government to offer its services as a mediator between Great Britain and the South African Republic was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the International Peace Conference recently held at The Hague declared, and to the declaration is attached the signatures of the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain, that: "With a view to obviating, as far as possible, recourse to force in the relations between the states, the signatory powers agree to use their best efforts to insure the pacific settlement of international differences.

"In case of serious disagreement or conflict, before an appeal to arms, the signatory powers agree to have recourse, as far as circumstances will allow, to the good offices or mediation of one or more friendly powers.

"Independently of this recourse, the signatory powers recommend that one or more powers, strangers to the dispute, should, on their own initiative, and as far as circumstances may allow, offer their good offices or mediation to the states at variance.

"Powers, strangers to the dispute, have the right to offer good offices or mediation, even during the course of hostilities.

"The exercise of this right can never be regarded by one or the other of the parties in conflict as an unfriendly act." Therefore

Resolved, That the United States of America offers its good offices as a mediator in an endeavor to reconcile the opposing claims and appease the feelings of resentment which have arisen between the Empire of Great Britain and the South African Republic and the Orange Free State, with a view to securing a conclusion of the war now existing between those two nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the joint resolution lie upon the table subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATE BANK TAX.

Mr. McLAURIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1) to affirm the existing standard of value, to maintain the parity in value of all forms of money, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes; which was read, as follows:

To the said bill add the following:

"SEC. 9. That sections 8412 and 8413 and all other acts and parts of acts which impose any tax upon the circulation of State banks or State banking associations be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Abram D. Newman, S. 2731, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, copies of the same being first left on file, the claim having been reported adversely.

INTERCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of December 20, 1899, asking for information respecting the edition and distribution of the report of the Intercontinental Railway Commission, I transmit herewith a detailed statement from the Secretary of State.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 8, 1900.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION ACT OF MARCH 9, 1898.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read. The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Attorney-General, and the Postmaster-General, and each of them, be, and they are hereby, respectively directed to inform the Senate what portion of the $50,000,000 appropriated by Congress under the act approved March 9, 1898, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes," was assigned to and expended by, or under the direction of, said respective Departments, and they are further respectively hereby directed to furnish the Senate an itemized statement of the amount of said sum thus expended by them.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to the passage of that resolution that I can conceive of, but the information has already been before the Senate and can very readily be furnished to the Senator without sending to the Departments. We have had it here; we have discussed it, and it has been stated upon the floor how the $50,000,000 was divided; but if the Senator desires the information to be put in the form of a reply from the Departments I do not object.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to have it in the form of a public document.

Mr. HALE. I do not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HARBOR OF WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause a survey and estimate to be made for the dredging of a basin in the harbor of Wilmington, N. C., of sufficient dimension to allow a vessel of large tonnage to turn or swing around in said harbor.

ADMIRAL DEWEY'S REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW January 4, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a copy of Admiral Dewey's report of April 13, 1898, or about that date, in which the Admiral says he can take Manila at any time.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the information the Senator seeks for can be very easily obtained by any individual Senator asking for it. I have the report to which I think the Senator refers; but he has got the date somewhat wrong.

I do not think, however, that it has been the practice of the Senate to stifle resolutions of inquiry. When they are couched in proper form and where they seek to bring to the Senate information upon public business, the rule of the Senate has been to pass them. I think it was so stated the other day by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I agreed with him at that time, and I think that that is so now. Resolutions are presented sometimes in such form that they cease to be mere resolutions of inquiry, and they should either be referred to a committee or amended and put in proper shape. I do not see that this resolution of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] is subject to any objection of that kind. If the Senator desires that it shall go as the request of the Senate and that the reply be sent to the body, as no doubt it will be forthwith, he will get the same information that he would have obtained if he had sent a telephonic message to the Secretary of the Navy, or had himself called and said he wanted the information, or had pursued any other method which Senators usually pursue; but if the Senator has chosen this way and prefers this, as his resolution is simple in form and only requires information, I will not object to it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I suppose all resolutions of inquiry of the Executive Departments of the Government could be done away with by writing letters on the part of individual Senators; but such information comes to a Senator, where, however, a resolution is passed by the Senate the information goes to the Senate and to the public. Therefore, if any resolution of inquiry is justified, it seems to me this resolution is, and of course I desire its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask to have the resolution again read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will again be read. The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Is April 13, 1898, the date given in the resolution, the date of the report called for?

Mr. PETTIGREW. At or about that date. For the purpose of more definitely indicating the report I wanted, I added the language which I understand the paper contains.

Mr. ALLISON. Where could that have been made—at what place?

Mr. HALE. On the flagship Olympia, at Hongkong, March 31, 1898.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the Senator from South Dakota any knowledge that there is such a letter? If so, I shall not object to the resolution.

Mr. President, the question before the Senate the other day when some criticism was made of other Senators by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was that four Senators had objected to a resolution, which caused it to go over to the next day, when one of them might more properly, I suppose the Senator thought, have done it. Then the Senator from Massachusetts said that if that sort of thing was to go on the Senate would be abolished. This put those four Senators in a very awkward position, myself among the number, because I have too much regard for the Senate, and shall have so long as I remain here, to wish to be a party to abolishing it; and I was not aware that I was doing that thing until the objection was made.

Mr. President, the rules which require the unanimous consent of Senators are supposed to be wisely framed. If they are not wise, they can easily be altered upon a report made from the Committee on Rules, of which the senior Senator from Massachusetts is a member; but so long as those rules stand here, giving the right to any Senator who either objects to the language of a resolution or who wishes to ascertain more definitely what information is called for, it is the privilege of any Senator to invoke the rule and ask to have a resolution go over, and, so far as I know, it is the privilege of four Senators to do it at once, or to do it singly, or they may do it in platoons, or they may do it all together, if they see fit. They are entitled to be relieved from criticism for exercising the rights which belong to them as members of the Senate, and for one I stand here to say that it is in bad taste to object to any Senator who invokes a rule requiring unanimous consent and declines to yield to an appeal to withdraw his objection. I do not like it myself, and I do not intend to withdraw an objection that I may deliberately make by reason of any such appeal, unless I see fit to do so, and I hope other Senators, notwithstanding the admonition they received the other day, will make objection to resolutions which they wish to examine before they are acted upon. That was all that took place the other day.

To the resolution as now before the Senate I have no objection, and I shall vote against almost no resolution the Senator from South Dakota can contrive which shall ask merely for information from the Executive Departments of the Government. If he puts statements into a resolution which I do not know to be true and do not propose to assert as facts by voting for the resolution, or if he puts a stump speech into a resolution—and I do not think the Senate ought to make a stump speech in a resolution of inquiry—I shall either vote against the resolution or move to lay it on the table. I am just as willing as the Senator from South Dakota and the senior Senator from Massachusetts to have all facts relating to public affairs in the possession of the executive department come before Congress for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under unanimous consent of the Senate, given at the last sitting, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW January 3, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether General Torres, one of the officers of the Philippine army, came to General Otis with a flag of truce on February 5, 1899, the day after the fighting commenced between our forces and those of the Filipinos, and stated to General Otis that General Aguinaldo declared that fighting had been begun accidentally and was not authorized by him, and that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of a width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflict between the two armies, and whether General Otis replied that fighting having once begun must go on to the grim end. Was General Otis directed by the Secretary of War to make such an answer? Did General Otis telegraph the Secretary of War on February 9, 1899, as follows: "Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference. Have declined to answer." And did General Otis afterwards reply? Was he directed by the Secretary of War to reply; and what answer, if any, did he or the Secretary of War make to the application to cease fighting?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose, Mr. President, the subject-matter of that resolution comes within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Philippines. I was one of those who asked to have the resolution go over the other day, and I supposed then, and still believe, that I was acting within my right under the rules to have so complicated a resolution as that printed and laid before us, so that we could read it with more care.

I am quite certain that it has been the habit in this body to send resolutions over when there are objections, and that it is not the universal practice to pass them the day they are offered. I know that older and wiser Senators than I have sent over some resolutions of inquiry which I have offered, and it seemed to me proper that this resolution should go over until we could consider it more fully.

Now, Mr. President, I see no objection whatever to giving all possible information in regard to every transaction in the Philippines. I certainly, for one, have no desire to see anything whatsoever suppressed, and I do not believe there is any desire anywhere to have anything suppressed. But I do think that the resolutions of inquiry offered by the Senator should be put in a proper form. It seems to me that a resolution like this, which is rather in the nature of filing interrogatories and cross-questioning the Secretary of War as to one particular incident, is a process which would involve similar resolutions day after day and day after day, in order to get at the information which is obviously desired.

It seems to me that the proper scope of a resolution of inquiry and the proper form in which to put it is a general form asking for everything relating to a certain subject; and I would offer as a substitute for the resolution presented by the Senator from South Dakota the following:

Resolved, That the President be requested to send to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, all reports and dispatches relating to the insurrection in the Philippines, and especially any information as to communications or correspondence with the insurgents, from the 1st of January, 1898, on the part of any officer in the military, naval, consular, or diplomatic service of the United States.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that substitute covers everything that can possibly be desired. It covers the scope of the question of the Senator from South Dakota and every other of a similar character; and it seems to me that that is the better form in which to put the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question as to the scope of the substitute which he has just offered. I ask at what date the Senator regards the Philippine people as having become insurgents? Do the communications referred to embrace communications which were sent to our officers prior to the ratification of the treaty with Spain as well as those sent after that time?

Mr. LODGE. I take it they do, of course. They go back and cover the whole period.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the language used by the Senator in the substitute would limit the call to communications with the insurgents; and I want to know when they became insurgents, according to the Senator's idea.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose the language employed would cover the day or the night of the insurrection—beginning on the night they attacked our troops at Manila.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the resolution would limit the sending in of communications to those which had been made after that time rather than before?

Mr. LODGE. At that time the treaty had not been ratified, it is true, but I think the language of the substitute would cover everything relating to our communications with the Filipinos.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about the limit?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator wishes to make the substitute more explicit and to cover more time, let him go back to the beginning of the war with Spain.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then let the Senator put that in the resolution, and we will get the information which the Senator from South Dakota was denied the other day.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I would suggest that the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts be printed, and that the subject go over until to-morrow without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] asks unanimous consent that the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] be printed, and that the subject-matter go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator to say Wednesday.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to that.

Mr. President, the reason I desire the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to go over is that I think it can be so framed as to satisfy me with regard to this inquiry. I simply wish to get at the facts. I wish to speak upon the subject. It is the duty of Congress to legislate. A war is going on which was not declared by Congress, and before we can legislate we must have this information in order to intelligently represent the American people upon this great subject. I think perhaps the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts can be so amended that it will be satisfactory.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota. I inquire if Congress is not already committed to the war in the Philippines by having sent large armies there? Have not 60,000 men been sent there by authority of Congress? It seems late to investigate the cause of the war after the United States, under the authority of Congress and the Executive, has been engaged in it for eleven months.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will answer the Senator when he is through.

Mr. STEWART. I am through.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Congress did pass a law allowing the Executive to enlarge the Army, but Congress did not declare war and took no step in that direction. During the recess of Congress it was repeatedly said that the President could not do otherwise than he was doing, because Congress had not required him to do otherwise. The excuse was that Congress had not acted upon this matter. The Administration undertook to escape the responsibility of this war by shifting it upon Congress and then refusing to call Congress together. Months elapsed after we had adjourned before the Army was enlarged, and then it was done by an act of the Executive, and this war was commenced by him; it was declared by proclamation from him before the treaty with Spain was ratified, and has been prosecuted by him in violation, as I believe, of every principle of this Government. Congress has now convened, the duty is upon us, and we can not escape it unless we are ready to abdicate our functions as the governing body of this country and to establish the supreme authority of the President himself.

This information, then, is necessary. If we have attacked an ally who was acting with us, representing a government based upon the principles of the Constitution of the United States, it is quite important that the representatives of the people of this country should know the facts, and know them at once. I believe we have attacked an ally; I believe we have been guilty of the grossest treachery; I believe that we have gone further in dishonor toward an ally fighting with us than any nation ever went in all history.

Mr. President, I did not wish to address the Senate to-day upon this subject; neither do I intend to do so. I simply want this information before I do address the Senate upon this subject, and I know of very many people in this country who also desire it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The subject has gone over at the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STEWART. Inasmuch as the Senator and I differ as to what has occurred, I wish to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Nevada proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to some of the provisions of the act of March 2, 1899, which read as follows:

SEC. 12. That to meet the present exigencies of the military service the President is hereby authorized to maintain the Regular Army at a strength of not exceeding 65,000 enlisted men, to be distributed among the several branches of the service, including the Signal Corps, according to the needs of each, and raise a force of not more than 35,000 volunteers, to be recruited as he may determine from the country at large or from the localities where their services are needed, without restriction as to citizenship or educational qualifications, and to organize the same into not more than 27 regiments, organized as are infantry regiments of war strength in the Regular Army, and 3 regiments to be composed of men of special qualifications in horsemanship and marksmanship, to be organized as cavalry for service mounted or dismounted.

Section 15 contains the following clause:

And provided further, That the President is authorized to enlist temporarily in service for absolutely necessary purposes in the Philippine Islands volunteers, officers, and men, individually or by organization, now in those islands and about to be discharged, provided their retention shall not extend beyond the time necessary to replace them by troops authorized to be maintained under the provisions of this act and not beyond a period of six months.

The act provides in detail how the exigencies of the Army existing on the 2d of March, 1899, shall be met, and expressly provides for recruiting three regiments in the Philippine Islands, where the war was raging. The United States had no other war on hand at the time, and no other emergencies existed. The legislation increasing the Regular Army to 65,000 and authorizing a volunteer force of 35,000 men and three regiments to be organized in the Philippine Islands was for the express purpose of prosecuting the war and of suppressing the insurrection in those islands. The war, under the authority of Congress, has been carried on for about eleven months, until it is too late to inquire how the United States became involved in it. If the inquiry had been made in February last, it might have been pertinent, but now, after my country is engaged in war under the authority of the legislative and executive departments of this Government, and after thousands of precious lives have been sacrificed and millions expended under the authority of the war-making power, it is my country's war, and the origin or motive of the war can not now be questioned. The lives sacrificed and the money expended in a war authorized by Congress should preclude any effort on the part of patriotic citizens to prove that the war was wicked in its origin.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The subject is not before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I do not understand that any disposition has been made of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By agreement it has gone over.

Mr. LODGE. I did not hear any question put and I did not hear the consent of the Senate asked. It was my substitute about which the question was made.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] asked that the substitute be printed and go over.

Mr. LODGE. I heard the Senator from South Dakota make the request, but I did not know that the request had been submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that he put the request to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It is my fault, then, if I did not hear it. I merely wish to say that, while I do not think this is the time to discuss this question, I do not wish to allow statements made by the Senator from South Dakota to go out with the impression that Senators here all admit by silence their truth. I do not believe that we have attacked an ally. I am certain we never recognized that so-called Filipino government. The Filipinos had no government except the government of a dictator, set up by himself to impose his authority on other tribes. They attacked us; we did not attack them. The President has acted in absolute conformity with law from the beginning to the end, and they who are fighting us are insurgents against the rightful authority of the United States.

As the Senator from South Dakota has laid down the propositions which he hopes to discuss further, and I trust he will when he gets the information, I merely wanted to say that these are some of the propositions which some of us also hope to discuss when the matter comes up. I have no objection to having the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution going over with the amendment? The Chair hears none, and it will go over until Wednesday.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I desire to call up Senate resolution No. 25 for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to submit some remarks on the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina calls up a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PRITCHARD December 12, 1899, as follows:

Whereas the legislature of the State of North Carolina, at its session of 1896, submitted to the people of that State, for ratification or rejection, a proposed amendment to the constitution of said State, as follows:

"SEC. 4. Every person presenting himself for registration shall be able to read and write any section of the Constitution in the English language; and before he shall be entitled to vote shall have paid, on or before the 1st day of March of the year in which he proposes to vote, his poll tax as prescribed by law for the previous year. Poll taxes shall be a lien only on assessed property, and no process shall issue to enforce the collection of the same except against assessed property."

"SEC. 5. No male person who was on January 1, 1867, entitled to vote under the laws of any State in the United States wherein he then resided, and no lineal descendant of any such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote at any election in the State by reason of his failure to possess the educational qualifications prescribed in section 4 of this article: Provided, He shall have registered in accordance with the terms of this section prior to December 1, 1902. The general assembly shall provide for a permanent record of all persons who register under this section on or before November 1, 1902, and all such persons shall be entitled to register and vote at all elections by the people in this State, unless disqualified under section 2 of this article: Provided, Such persons shall have paid their poll taxes as required by law."

And whereas section 5 of the proposed amendment undertakes to confer the right of suffrage on one class of citizens of that State and to exclude another class of citizens from the enjoyment of said privilege:

Resolved, That section 5 of the proposed amendment is in contravention of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and that any State that adopts said provision as a part of its organic law does not possess a republican form of government as contemplated by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask leave to withdraw the pending resolution and offer a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to do that. The proposed substitute will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That an enactment, by constitution or otherwise, by any State which confers the right to vote upon any of its citizens because of their descent from certain persons or classes of persons, and excludes other citizens because they are not descended from such persons or classes of persons having all other qualifications prescribed by law, in the opinion of the Senate, is in violation of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States and of a fundamental principle of our republican form of government—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the original resolution will be regarded as withdrawn and the resolution just read will be substituted for it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the resolution read at the desk reveals the fact that we have reached a danger point in the history of the Republic which we can not avoid or neglect.

It has not been suddenly or designedly sprung upon the country by any recent event or by any recent political movement.

The immediate cause of this dangerous condition originated more than a third of a century ago, a time that antedates the birth of this generation of Americans. The trouble has lingered like a smoldering fire, burning into the vitals of the country and creating discord and irritation, political and social, and now it has reached the open and demands our best efforts to control it.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] has wisely discerned that this serious and unavoidable question is now before the country for solution by popular suffrage. With equal forecast, and, doubtless, a desire for the peace of the country, he asks for its consideration before the great event of a Presidential election, the first in the new century, has resulted in a vote of the electors for President and Vice-President and before February, 1901, when the election will be ascertained and declared in the two Houses of Congress. In view of that certain event, it is not possible that this question can be repressed or evaded, either in the Presidential election or in the elections for all the members of the House of Representatives and one-third of the Senate in this year of 1900.

The next apportionment of representation in the House enjoined by the Constitution must be made by this or the Fifty-seventh Congress, and the principles on which that apportionment will be made will be a question of the gravest importance in the elections that must be held in November of the present year.

To refuse now to consider this question, in advance of these elections, is to draw the country into the vortex of angry and dangerous excitement such as seriously threatened the safety of the Republic in 1876 and 1877.

Whichever of the great national parties is successful in the November elections, this question will be raised in the count of the votes for President and Vice-President.

It is a very high and solemn duty, that should be performed before the elections are held and at a time when the decision will not be so likely to refer to the success of either party in that event which determines the succession to the Presidency and is the most momentous political contest that occurs in any nation of the world.

In the light of our experience in 1877, which created a feeling of unrest that has not yet ceased, we can not afford to permit an unsettled question that we know can not be avoided to engender another controversy such as arose in the Hayes-Tilden election. The people should decide it in the elections of A. D. 1900 upon propositions submitted to them in some form.

I am convinced that no other tribunal except the people voting in the elections has the right or the power to finally settle this question here presented in the resolution offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and I will endeavor to sustain this view of the matter in my further remarks to the Senate.

The resolution as amended and also in its original form is not intended to have the force of law, as it should have, if the Senator from North Carolina really desires such action as will settle the question he forces upon the attention of the country. It is only an expression as to what he thinks the law ought to be. It is not an enactment, but is the expression of a view or opinion. If such a resolution is not obeyed, there are no penalties for its violation, either by individuals or by the State. No results follow its violation in any legal sense. A departure from the principle stated in the resolution as a correct principle of government involves only a difference of opinion between those who adhere to it and those who choose to reject it.

The resolution, in its original form and as it is modified, if it is adopted, would not control this or a subsequent Congress either as to the form or the substance of any enactment that Congress may make for the enforcement of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution.

If we should adopt the resolution it would be brutum fulmen that this Congress or a subsequent Congress would follow or reject at will.

The honorable Senator would doubtless have presented a bill that would reach and prevent the alleged wrong or evil he intends to suppress or prevent if he could have devised a scheme by which he could coerce a State to amend its constitution under the penalty of being driven from the Union or of being refused representation in Congress or in the electoral college.

It is too plain for argument that such a measure would abolish the State as to all its rightful sovereign powers, and would remand it to the condition of our organized Territories, all of whose laws may be repealed by Congress and all of whose officials may be placed under the power of appointment and removal by the President.

In his original resolution the honorable Senator distinctly took this ground as to the duty and power of Congress in dealing with any State whose constitution violates the fifteenth amendment when he asserted that such a State has not a republican form of government. On further reflection he endeavors to get away from this dangerous ground and to retreat to a position that is apparently less strenuous, somewhat less heroic, and less dangerous to the State and the Federal Union. It is evidently intended by this substitute to declare in another form of words the same principle and the same appeal to the power of Congress to deal with a State, as such, that is only more distinctly expressed in the Senator's original resolution.

The substitute is as follows:

Resolved, That an enactment by constitution or otherwise by any State which confers the right to vote upon any of its citizens because of their descent from certain persons or classes of persons and excludes other citizens because they are not descended from such persons or classes of persons, having all other qualifications prescribed by law, in the opinion of the Senate is in violation of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and of a fundamental principle of our republican form of government.

A particular state of facts is here presented, which is declared as violative of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution and as being also violative of "a fundamental principle of our republican form of government."

The allusion here is distinctly made to the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which is that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion," etc.

I suppose the Senator will admit that this is the section and article to which he refers when he speaks of "a fundamental principle of our republican form of government." The point in both forms of the resolution is that Congress can deal directly with North Carolina and inflict penalties on her as a State, and as a State standing by itself, if she amends her constitution in the manner described in the preamble to the resolution.

The substituted resolution I have just read is not true in point of law. It is not a discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery, unless the act excludes them by its terms, or by necessary intendment from its terms, for such causes. The exclusion of certain persons or classes of persons or their descendants can be lawfully made in many cases and for many reasons that have no relation to race or color or previous condition of servitude.

The resolution begs the question when it admits the right to exclude those who have not all the other "qualifications prescribed by law" from the right to vote.

Chinamen, Japanese, and Indians, who are citizens of the United States, may be lawfully excluded from the right to vote for any reason, even for their race or color, simply because the States prefer to refuse them that privilege; yet in all other respects they may have the qualifications prescribed by law.

Many white persons who were engaged in rebellion against the United States were excluded from the right to vote by acts of Congress passed after the alleged ratification of the fourteenth amendment. They possessed all the other qualifications, but imputed crime disqualified all of certain classes of white persons from voting and still excludes all of them from holding office whose disabilities have not been removed by a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress.

It has been settled in various cases by the Supreme Court that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments apply exclusively to the negro race.

These decisions are far short of the full meaning of the text of these amendments, although they agree with the common understanding of the purpose of their ordination. An Indian or negro State could constitutionally exclude white men from voting on account of race or color under these decisions, but it is held that no State can lawfully exclude negroes from the ballot box for the same reasons.

In his effort to obtain a vote of the Senate denouncing a proposed constitutional amendment, now pending before the people of that State, the Senator from North Carolina has stepped over the lines of protection created by the sovereignty of the State as to defining the right or privilege of suffrage, and denies to North Carolina the right to confer upon its citizens the right to vote because they are descended from certain persons or classes of persons and exclude other citizens who are not descended from such persons or classes of persons.

Many free negroes fought for the Whigs in North Carolina in the war of the Revolution, and all free negroes having certain property qualifications were qualified voters under her first constitution. If those who fought with the Whigs had been admitted as qualified voters, while all other free negroes were excluded, that would not have been a discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; yet it would have applied to race and color and to a special cause of qualification that the negroes who fought with the Tories did not possess.

If such a qualification could then be applied to free negroes who fought for the United States in aid of the revolution that succeeded in that struggle, without creating a discrimination as to race, color, or previous condition of slavery, it would equally apply to the class of negroes who aided the United States in putting down the revolution of 1861-65.

There is no more reason under the Constitution for refusing to extend these privileges to the children of negroes who were soldiers in either war than there would be for refusing to extend their pensions to their descendants.

In North Carolina the question before the people as to the purpose of the proposed amendment of the constitution is the same in substance if it is not identical with that which is embodied in the constitution of Louisiana.

In Louisiana the constitution adopted May 12, 1898, is an entire and complete body of organic law, inseparable in its integrity and incapable of being so dealt with as to take from it the provisions relating to the qualifications of electors and to registration of voters and as to elections, without destroying the plan of government. If such provisions are eliminated from the constitution there are none to be substituted for them so as to patch up a constitution formed in part of the present constitution and in part of the former constitution, which it has substituted and repealed.

It must be the purpose of the resolution before the Senate to draw into question the validity of these features of the constitution of Louisiana as a test of the constitutional validity of the proposed amendments to the constitution of North Carolina.

I will therefore treat the resolution in that light.

On examining the full text of the Louisiana constitution bearing on the question of negro suffrage, I am satisfied, contrary to my first impression, that its legal interpretation discloses no purpose to discriminate against any person claiming the right to vote at any election on the ground of his or her race, color, or previous condition of slavery.

The general belief as to the purpose of those who ordained this constitution is that it was intended to disfranchise a large number of negroes as to their right to vote in Louisiana. It is possible that Congress may reach that conclusion, and will proceed, with such powers as they possess, to the effort to annul the constitution of Louisiana by replacing it with laws that will repeal those parts relating to suffrage and institute other provisions in their stead. It is also possible that Congress will adopt the plan proposed in the original resolution of the Senator from North Carolina and declare that Louisiana has no government that is republican in form.

The necessary consequence of such a declaration would be that the State would be reduced to a Territorial government, or will be placed under military supervision, as Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, and other States were held under the reconstruction laws of 1867, and held in that grasp of power until the people have formed such a constitution as will meet the approval of Congress; yet it is far from being probable that Congress will venture so rashly. The die is cast in Louisiana, and Congress must decide upon their own judgment and responsibility to the people, whether that State has violated the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States, and, if they so decide whether any and what measures will be taken to hand the State in order.

I need not say one word to impress the Senate and the people with the dread significance of this situation. I can only appeal to the forbearance, the wisdom, and patriotism of Congress and the people for a dispassionate consideration of the subject. It is clear, I think, to everybody that when any remedy or penalty is to be enforced against a State, under either of these amendments, Congress has the sole and exclusive power to deal with the subject by appropriate legislation, but it must do this within the clear limitations of its authority. If the rights of any person are alleged to be denied by any other person or by a State, the jurisdiction that can give a remedy is in the judicial department, when Congress has conferred that jurisdiction.

The judgment of a court, operating in personam, can enforce the personal rights of the injured party under the fourteenth amendment when Congress has provided such a remedy. No such jurisdiction or remedy is provided under the fifteenth amendment. The exclusive power given in the fifteenth amendment is that of appropriate legislation by Congress. That power touches the States and the United States as governments; and if it is ever extended so as to affect the rights and remedies of persons, that can only be done by appropriate legislation.

Until it is so expressly provided by law neither the courts nor the Chief Executive can take any action against a State or a person to enforce the fifteenth amendment.

Any question of coercion, therefore, that arises under the fifteenth amendment as against a State or its officers is legislative—which means political—and is neither judicial nor executive until it is made such by act of Congress. All the relations between Congress and the States are political.

The obedience that the States, as such, are required to observe toward the United States, where the laws of the United States are supreme, is political in its character and can not be enforced by the decrees of the courts.

The Supreme Court follows the lead of Congress in such questions. Whatever law of Congress or act of Government that relates to the relations of the States and fixes them, like the relations with foreign governments, is political, and the Supreme Court has uniformly refused to take jurisdiction of them.

The Supreme Court, in a number of cases, have considered the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments separately and in connection, and no suggestion of any conflict between them has been made.

According to accepted rules of construction, that apply with peculiar force to organic laws, each ordinance and every part of each must stand in full effect, if that is possible, and each will be operative in the field of action that is open to it.

Yet the whole body of the organic law must be construed together as one complete system.

The deductions to be made from the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution in their relation to negro suffrage, as the same are construed by the Supreme Court, are:

First. That so far as they relate to suffrage they affect only the negro race who are citizens of the United States.

Second. That they protect negro suffrage only against the operation of laws that exclude them from voting, by provisions that discriminate against them on the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Third. That the power to extend this protection is legislative and is vested in Congress, to be exercised by appropriate legislation.

Fourth. That when Congress exercises this power directly against a State it is expressly limited to the right to reduce the basis of apportionment of such State in the proportion that the number of negroes that are excluded from voting by the State laws bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

Fifth. Whether the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments repeal or modify the fourth section of Article I of the original Constitution as to the legislation that Congress may provide for the especial protection of negro suffrage is a question that does not concern what Congress may do in the enforcement of those amendments.

Sixth. But in all the provisions of the Constitution touching the subject of elections none of them are self-executing as against the States concerned. As to the States, and as to any penalties or remedies that can be enforced against them, no power exists in any department of the Government, except Congress, through appropriate legislation.

If Congress refuses to act, neither the courts, through any writ or decree, nor the executive, through any force confided to it, can take a single step toward compelling the obedience of a State to the fourteenth or fifteenth amendments.

If acts of Congress enforce these amendments and individuals are affected by them or by State laws which they contravene, they operate, as do all other provisions of the Constitution, to test the validity of such acts, and the courts can decide as to their validity and enforce it where they have jurisdiction of the parties. To this extent and in this way all the provisions of the Constitution are self-executing.

It is quite a different question when the courts or the Executive undertake to enforce the Constitution against a State, in any form of procedure, when Congress has not defined the offense or provided a penalty. That is simply impossible. And Congress can inflict no penalty on a State for refusing suffrage to negroes except that which is provided in the fourteenth amendment.

That amendment, by a necessary implication, prevents Congress from driving a State out of the Union or from remanding it to a Territorial condition for refusing suffrage to negroes. And by clause 3 of section 2 of the Constitution, which provides that "each State shall have at least one Representative" in the House; and by the provision in Article V—which can not be amended—"that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," no State can be destroyed or expelled from the Union by act of Congress.

While Congress can, in certain cases provided for in the Constitution, enact laws that are supreme within a State, it can not create or adopt a constitution for a State.

The following questions bearing directly on this discussion are settled: In Minor vs. Happersett (21 Wallace, 193) it is decided that citizenship of the United States does not carry with it the right of suffrage and that the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone. That power belongs to the constitution and laws of the States.

In the case of United States vs. Reese (92 U. S., 204) it is held that the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage, but it invests citizens of the United States with the right of exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude and empowers Congress to enforce it by appropriate legislation.

The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment and can be exercised by providing a punishment only when the wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector is because of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

In United States vs. Cruikshank (92, U. S., 542) it is held that the Government of the United States, although it is, within the scope of its powers, supreme and beyond the States, can neither grant nor secure to its citizens rights or privileges which are not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction. All that can not be so granted or secured are left to the exclusive protection of the States.

The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. In Ex parte Yarbrough (110 U. S., page 665) the Supreme Court say:

This new constitutional right was mainly designed for citizens of African descent. The principle, however, that the protection of the exercise of this right is within the power of Congress is as necessary to the right of other citizens to vote as to the colored citizen and to the right to vote in general as to the right to be protected against discrimination.

In Williams vs. Mississippi (170 U. S., 213) the Supreme Court hold that "the discrimination that is violative of the Constitution as amended must appear on the face of the State law or by a necessary intendment from it and not from the manner in which the State law is administered."

In all these decisions we find that Congress alone can exercise the power to protect the negro against discrimination in respect of the right to vote, and that its power under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments is confined to this sole purpose.

It must also be such a discrimination as appears on the face of the law that is complained of, and must relate alone to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It is not enough to invoke the interference of Congress that such discrimination is possible, or even probable, under the administration of the law. It must be found in the legal construction of the law and in its legal effect. In this view of the law that governs in these matters the decision in the Mississippi case is conclusive to show that the text of the Louisiana constitution is not a legal discrimination against the negro on account of his race, color, or his previous condition of servitude, and the act is valid against the power of Congress to interfere with it.

The necessity for interference by Congress does not appear on the face of the Louisiana constitution, and Congress can not create that condition precedent to its action by a mere declaration, such as is called for in the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina. The contemplated action of North Carolina being the same in substance with that already taken by Louisiana, it is unjust to those people, and it will be in vain, that we fulminate resolutions of the Senate against them to alarm them into the further surrender of their rightful sovereign powers.

I assume, therefore, that no right to vote is vested in or confirmed to any person by the fifteenth amendment, except in the special instances mentioned in Yarbrough's case, and Congress can refuse to ride down a provision in a State constitution which denies to a negro the right of suffrage to the same extent that they could refuse to interfere if suffrage was denied to a white man because he is white; and such refusal puts it beyond the power of any other tribunal to interfere. Congress represents the will of the people and its majority vote is conclusive, as the verdict of the people, while it stands unreversed.

It is by no means a forced inference or conclusion drawn from the text of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution, or from its close correspondence with the like provision in the fourteenth amendment, or from the circumstances attending its adoption in Congress and its ratification by the requisite number of States, that it was intended to take the entire subject of negro suffrage from under a fixed rule of a constitutional guaranty and to leave it on the footing of a political question, to be determined by the votes of the people as experience and a wise public policy may require.

It was a mistake that has so far been destructive of our national harmony and has afflicted the people with incalculable evils, when we put the recognition and guaranty of slavery in the Constitution of the United States. It should have been left in the control of the lawmaking power of each State where it existed to continue it or abolish it, and within the power of Congress to admit or abolish it in the Territories.

A like mistake in regard to an established church was made in the constitution of the Latin States of America.

These two organic troubles fixed in the constitutional laws have kept this hemisphere beset with revolutions and almost unceasing warfare for nearly a century. Neither of them would have caused any serious trouble if these Republics, based on the freedom of man in his person and his religion, had left the restraints on those liberties which existed when the Republics were formed, to be relaxed or removed in obedience to public opinion, which, after all, is the controlling power in free governments.

If the mind that conceived and formulated the fifteenth amendment was directed to the purpose of bringing the whole subject of negro suffrage again within the control of the people, through their Representatives in Congress, acting within ordinary and appropriate powers of legislation and without the necessity of again amending the Constitution, it was as wise and benignant a thought as ever entered the brain of a statesman or found a response in the heart of a patriot. Whatever was the purpose, I am satisfied that this result has been reached, and that it now rests with Congress exclusively to say when and how far negro suffrage shall be modified or how far it shall be sustained.

The people through the fifteenth amendment have reserved the power to themselves to say in acts of appropriate legislation what disposition shall be made of negro suffrage in the States. This Legislative power is, of course, regulated by other limitations in our constitutional system of government, and is subordinate to the preservation of the Union and the integrity of every State that is a member of the Union. A State can not be relegated to a Territorial form of government or otherwise entirely deprived of its representation in the Senate or House of Representatives or in the electoral colleges because it has abolished negro suffrage in whole or in part. If its representation can be reduced for that cause, the fourteenth amendment furnishes the rule and prescribes the limit of such reduction.

The question of the protection of the suffrage of the negro against discrimination under the laws is the only one in reference to which the Constitution gives specific plenary and discretionary power to Congress, to be exercised by appropriate legislation or to be declined if Congress refuses to exercise the power. It is not mandatory, and no man can be conscience bound to exercise the power if he feels that it would imperil the country. In the fourteenth amendment the power to reject the negro vote is admitted, in favor of the States, and this right is nowhere taken away.

If the right thus given to the States is taken away by the fifteenth amendment, as I do not believe it is, the power of Congress over the subject is again repeated separately in that amendment, and it stands as the sole authority to deal with the subject, to be exercised at the discretion of Congress. It may be that a power is given to Congress to deprive the State of the right reserved in the fourteenth amendment, but, if so, it is only a power and Congress is not bound to use it.

Unquestionably this legislative power is political and is not judicial, and it conveys no vested right in the negro race to vote that can stand against the power of Congress to permit a State to disqualify them by refusing to proceed to enforce their demand for the ballot.

If Congress can enforce the demand of the negro for protection against discrimination in the ballot, by appropriate legislation, they can in their discretion, refuse or omit to enforce that demand. The grant of power to Congress to enforce the fifteenth amendment necessarily implies a discretion in its use. The Supreme Court has declared, in several cases, that neither the fourteenth nor the fifteenth amendments give the negro any vested right to the ballot. It is not, therefore, a right, but a policy, that is established and Congress is the sole judge as to the time and the occasion for enforcing that policy.

It was an auspicious day in the history of this grand Republic when the rules of constitutional restraint or mandate were so far relaxed as to allow the people to deal with this race question according to their just judgment concerning the safety of that race and the rightful supremacy of the white race.

If the new constitution of Louisiana and the proposed amendments to the constitution of North Carolina are in conflict with the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States, the whole subject of discrimination against negro suffrage is now presented to Congress and the people, to be settled by appropriate legislation, suited to the present situation, as duty and the general welfare shall hereafter require, and we are not forced to the difficult process of amendment to save the peace of the country. What, then, is the present duty of the American people on this subject, and what is the present requirement of the general welfare as to negro voters and the negro in politics?

More than half, probably three-fifths, of the voters of the United States, to whom these questions now address themselves, had no part in conferring suffrage upon negroes, and they are free from responsibility and largely from prejudice in the matter.

The fifteenth amendment was proclaimed on the 30th of March, 1870, as part of the Constitution, and no man born later than March 30, 1849, could have had a part in its adoption or ratification. Those who participated in it are 50 years old and upward. A new generation, in which every lawful voter has the right to be heard on this subject, as if it were for the first time presented, must be permitted to express its free and untrammelled opinion on this question, "Shall Congress proceed to deal with Louisiana for the course she has taken in amending her constitution in respect of the right of suffrage, or shall she be let alone?"

If the people say she shall be let alone, she will not be disturbed. This new generation of Americans are freethinkers and bold actors, within the limits of their rightful authority, on all matters that concern them and their posterity, and questions will be answered by them according to their merits and not according to the passions or prejudices of the former times in which they originated.

They now see that the Louisiana question must be disposed of, and that the Senator from North Carolina has raised it on the resolution now under discussion, and the Hon. Mr. CRUMPACKER has raised it in the other House on a bill to amend the census laws, and it must be decided.

They see that after the lapse of more than thirty years since negro suffrage was inaugurated, and in a time of political tranquility, a State that still dares to claim the proud title and heritage of a sovereign State of the American Union has deliberately and carefully completed the work of reconstructing her organic law and has included in her new constitution certain restrictions upon the qualifications of voters.

These new restrictions are condemned in the resolution now under discussion as being in violation of the provisions of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids any State from denying to any citizen of the United States the right to vote because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The great body of the voters in Louisiana who have ordained this constitution are men under 50 years of age and were never slaveholders. They are not affected by the relations that existed between former slaves and their masters, but are confronted with a race question that is maintained by both races with constantly increasing vigor and is already a settled aversion, attended with ill-concealed bitterness, jealousy, and hatred.

There is no possible relief from this condition except to draw the lines of political separation as clear and as deep as is the line of racial distinction between them. It is the blood of the races that can not lawfully mix, and no marriage tie is possible to create a lawful or tolerable union between them.

The separation is for the good of both races and is irrevocable. Being the work of divine wisdom, it is right and is not discreditable to either race.

In physical, mental, social, inventive, religious, and ruling power the African race holds the lowest place, as it has since the world has had a history, and it is no idle boast that the white race holds the highest place. To force this lowest stratum into a position of political equality with the highest is only to clog the progress of all mankind in its march, ever strenuous and in proper order, toward the highest planes of human aspiration.

Whoever has supposed or has endeavored to realize that free republican government has for its task the undoing of what the Creator has done in classifying and grading the races according to His will overestimates both the powers and the duties of its grand mission.

It is a vain effort and is fatal to the spirit and success of free government to attempt to use its true principles as a means of disturbance of the natural conditions of the races of the human family and to reestablish them on the merely theoretical basis, which is not true, that, in political power, all men must be equal in order to secure the greatest happiness to the greatest number.

The true, distinctive feature of republican government, based on the sovereignty of the people as the source of power, is that it is in every feature representative. In this it differs essentially from every form of government that looks up to some alleged superior power as having the right to govern the people.

The representative, when chosen, embodies the will of the people, and the majority rules in a republic.

If the republic includes two distinct races—the highest and the lowest in the scale of intelligence and capacity for wise and good government—their respective representatives can not be equal in ability and influence; and this fact destroys the possibility of equality in political power. One class of representatives will dominate the other so completely that the idea of free and equal government will be banished, and the results will establish the race that is dominant over the other as a subordinate, thereby converting the republic into a practical autocracy.

If the races are nearly equally divided in numbers, continual warfare will be the result.

The history of the Republic of Santo Domingo, where the contest is between the negro and the mulatto, will become the history of our Southern States if the basis of voting remains as it is, and the finale will be the expulsion of the negro or his extermination.

In our Republic, State and Federal, an arbitrary rule of law is adopted for the first organization and for all subsequent steps in government, which excludes four persons in each group of five from any right to a voice in government.

This selection relates only to age and sex. It excludes all who are not over 21 years old and selects the fifth person—a male—as the representative of himself and the four other persons, without reference to race, except as to Indians, who are entirely excluded. In a mixed community of whites and negroes the negro representative selected under this unnatural and purely arbitrary rule represents, in fact, the nonvoters of both races, while in his actions and votes he represents the clannish, exclusive, and embittered prejudices of the negro race, or else the personal influence of some white political master, who uses him to multiply his power. This is not an accidental or temporary condition that can be changed. It is a permanent and fixed condition that is inherent in the nature of these races, who are separated by as wide a distance as the Divine Creator could demark in assigning to each a separate and useful sphere of duty in the world.

The voter is a distinctively representative man, not chosen by his constituents and having no responsibilities toward them; and the choice of a negro, by an arbitrary law, to such an office is a political marriage and miscegenation. It can not be extended into the social relations of the races without depraving the white man or woman to the social and racial level of the negro, and therefore it breaks the interdependence of the social and political relations of the people of the Republic, which constitute the true life and strength of our form of government.

A line of social cleavage, defined by race antipathies, that separates vast masses of our people into antagonistic or competitive bodies can not be closed or obliterated by any contrivance of political union between them. The division will only be made more distinct and more permanent by such efforts. Political dissension added to race antagonism can never produce harmony in this Republic. And when our political action is separated by law from the social instincts and sentiments of the white people of this great Republic, its end can not be far distant.

The people of Louisiana, after nearly forty years of terrible experience, have taken the only peaceful methods left open to them to rid themselves of this fatal evil and injustice, for which they were never in any sense responsible; and the honorable Senator from North Carolina is here endeavoring to rivet the chains upon her and, in turn, to paralyze the effort of the people of North Carolina to escape from the same horrible condition.

Several of the other Southern States, urged by the younger men, born since 1847, and many older men, are moving, under the same impulse, in the same direction. They have not yet despaired.

It is the experiences of the younger men, arising out of the effort to work negro suffrage into our political system as a harmonious element, and not the prejudices or resentments of the former slaveholders, that have prompted this strong and decisive movement in the Southern States. It will never cease unless it is held down by military power. It is a social evil as well as political, and the cost of its suppression will not be counted by this and succeeding generations in connection with questions of material prosperity.

No great body of white people in the world could be expected to quietly accept a situation so distressing and demoralizing as is created by negro suffrage in the South. It is a thorn in the flesh and will irritate and rankle in the body politic until it is removed as a factor in government. It is not necessary to go into the details of history to establish the great fact that negro suffrage in Louisiana and the other Southern States has been one unbroken line of political, social, and industrial obstruction to progress, and a constant disturbance of the peace in a vast region of the United States.

No historian will ever be able to collect a hundredth part of the facts of that distressing history.

Few men and few families, white or black, have escaped its baneful effects.

Nothing could have been more unfortunate for the negro race or more disturbing or demoralizing to the white race.

Armed with the ballot, on the pretext that it was necessary for the protection of their rights and as the complement of their manhood, it has afflicted them with social aspirations that are impossible of realization, and in their disappointment they have constantly persisted in seizing by force the privileges that they vainly strive to attain to, as grotesque decorations of their liberties. Under the license which they include in their notions of liberty, desperate crime has been very often resorted to as their means of success, until there is no real safety for women and children exposed to their brutality even in the suburbs of Washington.

The ballot which was given them as a weapon of defense has been used by their white allies and leaders to fight their own battles for political offices and power, and this unscrupulous league of politicians have been always present in Congress, demanding seats in the Houses and looting the Treasury in the expenses of contests, all based on alleged frauds in counting the votes cast by negroes or in refusing to count votes that they did not cast.

In many places in the South the negroes have come to realize that there is an increment of value in the ballot, and many thousands of them are being sold, with little concealment, in doubtful counties, at $1 a vote.

It is not disputed or doubtful history nor concealed facts that I am quoting. I speak only of what is known almost of all men.

Neither is it to me a pleasant task. It is most disagreeable to every honorable man in the South to listen from year to year to accusations against our Southern people of frauds in the elections.

Nor is it any relief to know that equal or more dangerous frauds are practiced on white men in the Northern States.

If Southern white men have falsified election returns, they have the stronger, if not the better, reason that they are acting upon the same law of self-defense that insulted and outraged human nature resorts to for the protection of homes and families, women and children, from a race that sets at defiance all moral restraints upon their brutal desires and fills the country with horrors that defy description and a retaliatory vengeance that infuriates its inflictors with a spirit of uncontrollable rage. This generation and those who preceded them and were born in the nineteenth century were not responsible for the origin of this evil in America. It came here with the importation of negro slaves, who were in Africa the slaves of their own kindred.

It will be greatly modified when the white race are emancipated from the low standard of political equality with the negro race. It will end only when we, in obedience to a high obligation of national duty, have provided a home for the negro race that is suited to their traits, abundant in productions for their comfortable existence, and encouraging to their growth and full development—a country where the skies above them are not of brass, as they are here; a national home, in which there is full opportunity for their growth in body, mind, and spirit to the full stature of which they are capable and in the full enjoyment of religious and political liberty.

I owe them nothing but good will, but I can not include in that debt the sacrifice of the honor of the white race or the destruction of its prestige and hard-earned institutions of government, either to flatter their vanity or to reward those with power who have cursed this country with their enforced presence, or those who employ that race for the oppression of my native Southland. I was a soldier of the Confederacy, and, while I have always regretted the necessity that put me under arms in open hostility to the flag of our common country, I feel, as every Confederate soldier feels, that it is a peculiar honor that we were the only white men ever called upon, as soldiers, to defend the white race against a fanatical attack of so-called reformers and the deliberate organization of ambitious politicians, who forced us into war by their cruel design to put negro slaves on a political and social footing of equality with us.

So long as men are held responsible for the natural consequences of their acts we must feel that the events that led to that war anticipated, and that the consequences that resulted from it were intended to humiliate the Southern people to a social and political level with the negro race.

That feeling is now operating on the people of the later generation in creating a resentment that seems to increase, as it is constantly being more clearly developed, that the repose of the country is impossible while the present condition continues.

There are some propositions that are undeniable, which prove that perfect accord between the former warring sections of the Union can never be attained so long as the negroes are forced upon the white people of the Southern States as full and equal participants in the ballot box.

It was the presence of the negro in the United States that caused the civil war. If he had never been brought here there would have been no cause for that terrible conflict.

It is his voting power, in the control of white men, that caused the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution and the acts of reconstruction, which sunk the States affected by them to a lower condition in the rights of self-government than that of the Territorial governments. It was the presence of the negro that called the Army into the control of State governments and placed the legislatures and the courts under military guard.

The negro voter and the alleged civil rights of that race led to the effort to impeach a President of the United States and caused the perilous contest over the election of another President and Vice-President.

Many contests for seats in the House of Representatives and three contests in the Senate have been based upon alleged frauds that deprived negroes of their right to vote.

Many good and honorable white men have been sent to the penitentiaries for alleged interferences with negro votes and voters. In all the Southern States, and in a large number of counties and municipalities negro voting has caused tumult and violence, and over the entire South the depression of values and the interruption of industries for this cause has cost the people heavy losses.

Unrest, heated resentments, and personal violence have disturbed the people and have caused them to distrust the Government and sometimes to resist its authority. Judges and other State officers have been fined and locked up in prisons for alleged violations of laws enacted for the especial benefit of the negro race.

The catalogue of such events would be long and dark if it could be written so as to include them all. All this has been done to force the negro into political and social equality with the white man, and it has resulted in utter failure to lift that race into this artificial relation with the white race.

Nature is against it, and the real sentiment of the white people of the United States is averse to the continuance of this dangerous condition.

Louisiana has suffered from this cause as few other peoples have. The history of the conflicts and sufferings of her people in more than a third of the nineteenth century, if it could be written, would give support to her appeal to the people of the United States for deliverance that ought to reach the heart of every patriot in the land.

The appeal of North Carolina for the peaceful allowance of the restoration of her people to their former right of controlling their own affairs, without negro interference, will soon be announced by her people.

In the spirit of her Mecklenburg declaration of independence, but in loyal obedience to the laws and the will of the people of the United States, North Carolina declares the rights of her people, and will proceed to their protection unawed by any resolution the Senate may adopt with a view to rivet the chains upon their arms.

If the people of the United States shall vote, in the election of members of Congress in 1900, that Louisiana and North Carolina shall be let alone, they will not be disturbed for having done what every State would do, if this were a new question, now for the first time submitted to those States.

The Democratic party of the United States has always been a white man's party, and when the appeal of the people of Louisiana and North Carolina, supported by the Democrats in all the Southern States, is made to them they and a vast body of white men all over the country who have not acted with them in the past will unite in a demand that these sovereign States shall not be destroyed for taking care of the lives and happiness of their people.

If negroes had been admitted to the right of suffrage by the States as foreign-born persons are admitted to citizenship and suffrage—man by man, on an examination of their knowledge of our institutions and as to their personal qualifications to understand and honestly to exercise the privilege of voting—this dangerous evil would, probably, have been so far controlled, at least, as to have secured the peace of the country. Or if in the Philippine Archipelago a happy home is found for the African race, to which they would flock with rejoicings and grow into power beneath our flag, and among a people many of whom are their near kindred, there would be few to regret that our free Republic, with its free religion, had expanded to open this door to humanity.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution lie on the table for the present. I desire to give notice that on the 22d of this month I shall call it up for the purpose of submitting some remarks on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the resolution lie upon the table, subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

During Mr. MORGAN's speech, The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Alabama suspend for one moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no disposition to delay the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, but I should like to say that I would be glad to reach some understanding, if I can, as to the progress of the debate. I suppose some Senator in opposition to the bill may be ready to speak after the Senator from Alabama has concluded, or I should like to inquire what is the desire of Senators on the other side of the Chamber in regard to it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no desire on this side to delay the discussion of the bill. During the Christmas holidays, however, most Senators have been absent from the city, and I doubt if any Senator is ready to proceed to-day with the discussion of the bill. I would prefer that there should be no pressing action taken at present for the reason that there is no disposition to delay. We recognize the fact that you have a majority and that you can pass the bill without very much delay. We only want time enough to allow Senators to be prepared to make such arguments as they choose to make against it.

Mr. ALDRICH. My only disposition is to press the bill as rapidly as I can, consulting always the convenience of Senators. I understand perfectly the position that the Senator from Arkansas and other opponents of the bill take on this matter. It has been done in the Senate in the orderly disposition of business for many years. I did not make the suggestion at this time with any idea to inconvenience anyone, but that we might understand as far as possible just how the discussion would proceed.

Mr. STEWART. If it is agreeable, I should like to address the Senate on Thursday upon this bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am satisfied that no Senator desires to go on to-day, and I would prefer that the matter should go over. The Senator from Nevada has just given notice that he would like to address the Senate on Thursday. Of course there will be no objection to that. I assure the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senators on this side will, as early as they can, be ready to discuss the bill, and that it will not be unnecessarily delayed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill may be laid aside temporarily, not losing its place as the unfinished business, so that the Senator from Alabama may proceed. Let it be laid aside for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senator from Alabama be allowed to proceed with his speech. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Does the Senator ask that it be laid aside for the day?

Mr. ALDRICH. For the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF DEPENDENT PENSION ACT.

After the conclusion of Mr. MORGAN's speech,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule IX is before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust the first bill on the Calendar may be taken up. It is a bill in which the Grand Army of the Republic is greatly interested. I should like to have it passed, if there be no objection, and I think there will not be any serious objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is on the Calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the Calendar under Rule VIII may be proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the bill (S. 1477) in amendment of sections 2 and 3 of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole on a former day, and no amendments were recommended. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have an explanation of the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps I can state to the Senator briefly the purport of the amendments which this bill proposes to sections 2 and 3 of the act of June 27, 1890. They are two in number. They both have been not only recommended but urged by the Grand Army of the Republic, and the President of the United States in his last annual message recommended that one of the amendments should be incorporated into that act; that is, where section 3 provides that a widow without means of support other than her daily labor shall become pensionable, the Pension Bureau has ruled—it is an arbitrary ruling—that if she has an income independent of her daily labor to an amount equal to the pension she would receive—that is, $96 per year—she is not pensionable under this act. The Grand Army have asked that the act should be amended so that if the widow shall have an income not exceeding $250 per year in addition to the proceeds of her daily labor, and the President has likewise so recommended in his recent message, she may be pensionable under the act, and the amendment to the act proposes that that change shall be made.

The other amendment urged by the Grand Army, which seems to be fair, is that in estimating disabilities the Pension Bureau shall aggregate minor disabilities so as to give a soldier under that act a pensionable status. The Commissioner of Pensions says that that is the practice of the Bureau at the present time. I have taken occasion in the report I made on this subject to say that if that be so, then there can be no objection to enacting it into law. The proposition is—the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. SPOONER) asks me to repeat it—that in estimating the disability of a soldier, if he have three or four or five minor disabilities, they shall be aggregated; that is, if one disability entitles him to $2 per month, another to $2, and another to $2, those three disabilities may be aggregated so as to give him the minimum under this law, which is $6 per month.

It has been urged very earnestly and persistently by the members of the Grand Army and others that that was not the practice of the Bureau, but that the Bureau had decided over and over again that, unless a soldier had some one disability which entitled him to that rating under this act, he would not be granted a pension. As I said a moment ago, the Commissioner of Pensions says that the present practice of the Bureau is to aggregate these disabilities, and the proposed change in the law is to specifically state that that shall be done.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire for information what has been the theory, the legal construction, upon which the Pension Commissioner has held that under the law a widow receiving $96 a year independent of her pension should not be entitled to a pension?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know that there has been any legal construction on that point. In the investigation which was made on this subject I remember putting that question directly to the Commissioner of Pensions—that is to say, I propounded this interrogatory to him: "Is it not a fact that under the law as it stands to-day a widow who had any income, whether $1, or $100, or $500, independent of the proceeds of her daily labor, is not pensionable under this act?" He replied that that would be the proper technical construction, but the Bureau, or more properly the Secretary of the Interior, in, I think, a spirit of liberal construction, had placed the amount at a sum equal to the pension the widow would receive. I will read the law on that point so that there may be no misunderstanding about it, and I think Senators will agree with me that a strict technical construction would exclude pensions to widows who had any income whatever outside of the proceeds of daily labor. Section 3 reads:

That if any officer or enlisted man who served ninety days or more in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who has had an honorable discharge, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow without other means of support than her daily labor—

Mr. President, it is my judgment as a layman that a strict technical construction of that language would exclude a widow who had any support whatever outside of her daily labor. I think the Pension Bureau and the Interior Department have dealt liberally with that class of pensioners or beneficiaries under the law in even granting that they might be pensionable if they had an income equivalent to the annual amount they would receive in pensions.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose they were incapable of earning anything, what would be their status then?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think substantially the same. I have an impression that they would not be pensionable under the act as it stands to-day.

Mr. ALLEN. In that case a great majority of these widows—95 per cent of them—would be women so far advanced in life that they would be incapable of labor to any great extent outside of the discharge of the mere perfunctory duties of the household.

Mr. GALLINGER. Beyond a question, if the Senator will permit me, that hardship exists to-day as to a very large proportion of those widows.

Mr. ALLEN. Would it not be wise, under those circumstances, to strike out that clause, or at least to cover the feature of the case to which I have referred, and increase their allowances from $250 to $300 a year, according to the circumstances of each case?

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator not to embarrass the consideration of this measure by changing its present purpose. The President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Pensions, and the First Deputy Commissioner of Pensions have all agreed that the proper thing to do at the present time is to make those widows pensionable if they have not an income outside of their daily labor in excess of $250 a year.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, this bill is to correct a defect in the existing law, is it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. SPOONER. Not to correct any erroneous administration of the law by the Pension Bureau?

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely. I will say to the Senator, further, that the Grand Army have agreed upon that amount, and a committee of the Grand Army have been here urging it upon the President, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. ALLEN. I was just going to ask the Senator if the President, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of Pensions have agreed upon this sum?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would say to the Senator that such is the fact.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator will understand that I have no desire to embarrass the bill. I would gladly vote or do anything within my power to increase the amount, so as to place these unfortunate women in circumstances where they can be properly cared for. I do think it is almost inexcusable that a great Government like this should permit the remnants of the great army of thirty-five years ago to become practically mendicants and supplicants at the door of Congress for relief.

Respecting the other proposition, I want the Senator to understand, as he does understand, that I am not as fully informed about this matter as he is, and as I hope to be in the future; but it has been my understanding, since we voted some years ago that the minimum pension should be $6 a month, that the Pension Bureau, where the rating did not under the former law entitle the applicants to $6 a month, has dropped such pensioners out; that the four-dollar men and the two-dollar men have entirely disappeared from the pension rolls. That was not the purpose of the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. ALLEN. Excuse me a moment. The view at that time presented to the Senate, I distinctly remember, was that as to persons who were drawing pensions at all the amount allowed them should be brought up to $6 per month, and not that any person drawing under that sum should be discharged from the pension rolls.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I certainly think he is misinformed on that point. The Pension Bureau beyond a question did increase the pensions of the two and four dollar a month pensioners to the amount of $6 when we passed the statute to which reference has been made. That was my understanding.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, as I perhaps did not understand him. Does the Senator mean to say that in the administration of this law if a soldier is found to be pensionable at the rate of $2 he does not get anything at all?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I have been told by several pensioners who had been drawing less than $6 per month that when that law went into force they were dropped from the pension rolls.

Mr. TELLER. If that is so, it is a matter which I think Congress ought to take up, for we certainly did not intend anything of that kind. We intended to say that every soldier who was pensionable at any degree below $6 should be put up to $6 per month, and the discussion shows that.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I want to be understood. I do not mean to say that the statement is true; I do not know whether it is true or not, and therefore I do not want to put the Commissioner of Pensions in a wrong light; but that is the information I have had from several pensioners who had been drawing less than $6 per month.

If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I wish to ask one other question. I am seeking information upon this subject, and I stand sadly in need of it. It has been my understanding—I do not know where I got it from—that the rule in the Pension Office heretofore was that a pensioner would not be pensioned in any sum unless some one isolated disability entitled him to a specific rating; that is, you could not take one partial disability, another partial disability, and another partial disability, aggregate those disabilities, and permit him to draw a pension, but there must be some one single disability entitling him to a pension. I say, if that is true, it ought, in my judgment, to be corrected by this bill or some other bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. GALLINGER. In answer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], whom I, as chairman of the Committee on Pensions, welcome to that committee, because I think he is going to be a very valuable addition to the committee—he has converted me from some of the error of my ways on pension legislation—in answer to the point he has made, I will say that he is mistaken, I feel sure, in the view that when we made $6 the minimum pension those drawing less than that amount were dropped from the roll. They were simply advanced to the $6 rate. There is no question about that.

I think, however, the question raised by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] deserves a frank answer. I hope I am correct in the statement I will make, which is that the Pension Bureau has not construed our action to mean that a soldier having any disability—I mean now a new applicant for a pension—would be put on the roll at $6 per month if the disability only amounted to that for which $2 or $4 had been provided; that he must now prove a disability which would have amounted to the $6 rate; and the very point that this bill proposes is that these minor disabilities shall be aggregated so as to make a great many of those soldiers pensionable upon the aggregate of their disabilities, in place of their being rejected by the Pension Bureau, which contends that they should have one single disability to entitle them to that rating. The point the Senator raised I confess never occurred to me. I am not quite sure that we did mean that hereafter those who could prove a $2 rating should receive $6 a month pension. It would seem that was our purpose.

Mr. TELLER. Congress certainly did not intend to do such an atrocious thing as to say that a man who had a two-dollar disability should get nothing. That is very clear. We meant to say that if any soldier had a disability which would have theretofore entitled him to a two-dollar rating his pension should be raised to $6.

Mr. CULLOM. That was certainly my understanding.

Mr. TELLER. We never thought of saying, "Here is a man entitled to a pension of $3 a month, and because he is not entitled to more he can not have a pension of $2." That is absurd.

Mr. CULLOM. It never occurred to me that we were knocking out a large number of pensioners.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no. That legislation was meant to be in the interest of the soldiers. It may be—I am not going to criticize the Department—that they have properly construed the law; but if they have, we ought to change it, and change it instantly. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Pensions would ascertain about that, so that if necessary we may change it, because we have a contract with every soldier when he enters the Army—for it is really a part of his contract—that if a certain disability arises he shall have a corresponding pension. We can not take that away from him, and if we have done it inadvertently we should retrace our steps very rapidly.

Mr. ALLEN. I remember very distinctly when that amendment was under consideration. It was an amendment to an appropriation bill. When it was before the Senate it was distinctly understood that $6 per month was to be the minimum pension.

Mr. CULLOM. I so understood.

Mr. ALLEN. It was universally conceded that all smaller pensions would be brought to that amount.

Mr. TELLER. That is, if a man had any pensionable disability whatever, his pension should not be less than $6.

Mr. CULLOM. That certainly was my understanding.

Mr. TELLER. I recall it very well, Mr. President. We have not attempted to do so wicked a thing as that; and if we have done it, we have done it inadvertently. I do not say that the law can not be construed in that way; I do not want to make any reflection upon an officer who executes the law as he understands it, because that is his business; but if there is a fault, we should correct it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am new to pension legislation, because there has been very little of it passed since I have been a member of this body, and therefore I do not understand the words some Senators use. I understand the general meaning of "disability," but I do not understand the technical meaning and application of it. Here, for instance, Senators speak of "a two-dollar disability, a four-dollar disability, and a six-dollar disability."

I should like to have a little light as to how these disabilities are graded, as to what constitutes a two, a four, or a six dollar disability, and so on.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator, in reply, that that is largely an arbitrary matter on the part of the Pension Bureau. Some of the minor ratings are fixed by law.

Mr. TILLMAN. For instance, what would be the rate of pension allowed for the loss of an arm?

Mr. GALLINGER. In the first place the applicant is rated by the medical board under existing law, but that rating is not binding upon the medical officers of the Pension Bureau. They may ignore the rating entirely. They may and very properly do ignore it in some cases, because the ratings of the medical boards are sometimes absurd. I myself saw a rating made by a local medical board which gave a soldier, under the act of June 27, 1890, $144 a month, and yet the pension under the law is only $12 a month. That was an absurd rating, and of course the officers of the Pension Bureau put it aside as being unworthy of consideration. Minor disabilities, such as the loss of a finger, are pensionable at the rate of $2, according to my recollection, and the rates of pension for certain other disabilities minor in their nature are fixed by law.

Now, it has been asserted and contended with great earnestness that the Bureau in fixing a rating has ignored these minor disabilities—that is, so far as compounding them is concerned—and insisted that the soldier should have one single disability that should entitle him to a rating equivalent to the minimum under the law, which is $6 a month.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have in my mind (and it was because of that instance that I have participated in this debate at all) the case of a soldier of the Mexican war who lost an arm in one of the battles—I think Chertusco or Chapultepec—and who drew a pension before the war from the time when Mexican war veterans were allowed pensions of some amount, I do not know what. When the war broke out of course the pension dropped, and he did not get on the pension roll again until the general law was passed under which Mexican war veterans were pensioned. He has applied for an increase and has been turned down. His pension today is $8 a month. He got no back pension for the time between the beginning of the war and the time when the pension was renewed, and the Bureau has refused to allow him an increase.

Mr. TELLER. That was a specific pension for the loss of an arm.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to know what that pension is. You all talk about disability being rated so much, a finger so much, a hand so much, and so forth. I want to know what an arm is in the case of a man who is 72 years of age.

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator that that depends upon where the arm is off, whether above the elbow or below, but the rate is fixed by statute. I do not see why the soldier is not getting not $8, but the specific provision of the statute. I do not understand how that can be.

Mr. TILLMAN. He is just getting the general run of pension for no disability whatever.

Mr. TELLER. Was he in the Confederate army?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; he did not serve in the Confederate army, I think, because he lost an arm. He may have temporarily been in the Confederate army in some quartermaster's position or something like that. I am not certain on those points. I am getting ready to introduce a bill here to give him an increase of pension by special act, and I wanted to find out some of the methods that govern in these cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is a schedule of rates which I thought I had in my desk, but I do not place my hand on it just now. I will say to the Senator that I think that for the loss of an arm at the shoulder the pension is something like $35 a month. I am not quite sure as to that. I do not carry those figures in my mind. I wish I might. I can not quite understand, unless there is some special reason, some overwhelming reason—

Mr. TILLMAN. I have the report of the Pension Bureau on this man's case, in which I am informed that his application for increase was turned down because his circumstances did not seem to imply that he was in the poorhouse, or something like that, and he was not considered as worthy of the Government's bounty.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course we can not discuss the question of the loss of this man's arm. It seems to me incredible that if he lost an arm in the service he is not pensioned for that disability, which would be more than $8 a month. Under the Mexican war pension act, which is a service-pension act, the ex-soldiers are pensioned at $8 a month.

Mr. TILLMAN. Without regard to any special disability.

Mr. GALLINGER. Without regard absolutely to any disability at all. That act was subsequently amended so as to give them $12 a month if they could show that they were in extreme poverty or physical distress. So under the Mexican war pension act the maximum is $12 a month, but the original law granted a service pension of $8 a month. I think I am correct. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will remember.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was just going to suggest that the gentleman to whom the Senator from South Carolina refers is evidently pensioned under the general act of 1887, which grants $8 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. A service pension.

Mr. COCKRELL. It grants $8 a month to all soldiers of the Mexican war, regardless of their disabilities. It is what we call a service pension, and not a disability pension. When the Mexican war was in progress, or very soon afterwards, a law was enacted granting pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war for disabilities incurred in the service in the line of duty.

Mr. TILLMAN. This man lost an arm in battle.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is entirely distinct from the other class of pensions. Take the law of 1890. There a certain pension is granted, but the maximum is $12 a month, and it is immaterial whether the disabilities were contracted in the service in the line of duty or not, so that they were not due to vicious habits. But under the law of July 14, 1862, pensions are granted for disabilities contracted in the service in the line of duty, and there the limit is $72, according to the degree of disability incurred in the service in the line of duty.

Evidently your friend was pensioned under the act of 1887, giving a pension simply for service, and the maximum there is $8. In 1893, as the Senator from New Hampshire has said, it was increased to a maximum of $12 where they were dependent and unable to do any manual labor. There is where they have refused him an increase. Under that law they could not give it. It makes no difference what the physical condition was, they could not give over $12 a month under the law of June 27, 1890. It makes no difference what the physical condition of a man may be, they can not give him over $12 a month under that act.

Mr. TILLMAN. Am I to understand from the Senator from Missouri that there has been a discrimination against Mexican war veterans?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. How is it that a Union soldier who fought in the civil war gets discriminating pensions? A man is pensioned by reason of special physical disabilities, for the loss of limbs, or something of that sort, whereas a Mexican war veteran in exactly the same condition, who fought for the flag, is discriminated against, and not even allowed an increase when he applies for it, merely because he is not in the poorhouse.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are two classes of pensions which have been recognized in the Government. One is a pension for service—a service pension.

Mr. TILLMAN. This man is entitled to both. He is entitled to a pension for service and to a pension for disability, too.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is always a maximum for that; and it is immaterial in a great many cases whether the disabilities, if any, originated in the service in the line of duty or not. The Mexican war pension act of 1887 grants a pension of $8 for service for a certain length of time. It does not make any difference as to what his condition was. He might have been worth a million dollars. I believe the first pension granted under the law of 1887 was granted to a United States Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me ask the Senator right there, if he will permit me—

Mr. COCKRELL. It made no difference what the disability was, you could not increase the pension beyond $8 a month until the law of 1893 was passed, and that then gave $12. June 27, 1890, what is called the dependent-pension bill was passed in regard to the Union soldiers, and that granted a pension for all disabilities not due to vicious habits to a maximum of $12, rating the pensions, I believe, at that time from about $6 or $4. Now, that is the maximum under that law. Under the dependent-pension law of June 27, 1890, no matter what the disabilities were, they can not go over $12 a month. But now under the law of July 14, 1862, pensions are granted to ex-soldiers for disabilities contracted in the service in the line of duty. The maximum limit is $72 for a private soldier who is totally disabled for all manual labor, and so utterly helpless that he must have the personal presence and attendance of a helper all the time. He must require that all the time to get the highest rate.

Now, then, under that law there are allowances for certain characters of disabilities. There are allowances for the loss of a hand and the loss of a foot and the loss of an arm below the elbow or above it. I sent for the pension laws for the purpose of explaining that point. Unless a pension is granted for disabilities contracted in the service you can not go above the maximum allowed.

Mr. TILLMAN. What I am after, if the Senator will permit me, is this: I want to find out whether there exists a discrimination in favor of soldiers who fought in the civil war which the soldiers who fought in the Mexican war do not enjoy?

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a little discrimination, a very slight discrimination, in the language used in the law of June 27, 1890, and in the act of 1893, which was put on here in the Senate. The amendment was moved by the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Vilas, increasing the pension to $12. There is very little discrimination. I am not certain—it has been such a long while since I looked at it—whether the law granting to soldiers of the Mexican war pensions for disabilities contracted in the service in the line of duty ever at any time made provision for an increase to the extent that the law of July 14, 1862, and subsequent laws have made. I have not compared it.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the laws governing our pensions are so old that Senators who have been here as long as the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from New Hampshire can not tell us exactly the pensionable status of a man, I think it is time we should have some revision and understanding as to just what claims a Mexican veteran has.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, or the Senator from New Hampshire either, to tell me if he knows any case in which a Union veteran who is pensionable by special provision as to certain disabilities has ever had his financial status inquired into and has had his application for an increase of pension turned down by reason of the fact that he might have had an income from other sources?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not understand that that is the rule. It is a very rare circumstance for us to pass a special act for a man who has property sufficient to take care of himself. Under the act of June 27, 1890, especially the part applying to widows, that is absolutely enforced in all cases.

I think, Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, that there is no discrimination against the soldiers who fought in the war with Mexico. On the contrary, they have an advantage over the soldiers of the so-called civil war.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will accept the Senator's amendment; I will say war of the rebellion, if my words give any offense.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not referred to that at all. I do not deal in slurs or innuendos in debate, and it is immaterial to me what that war is called. I usually refer to it as the civil war. I have done so in my reports, and I have no disposition to offend anybody.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that the Mexican war soldiers were granted a service pension, the very thing the soldiers of the late civil war are contending that we ought to grant them; but we have not got to it yet. I believe that a service-pension bill was passed applying to soldiers of the Revolution—I think so.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, it was.

Mr. GALLINGER. Such was the fact, the Senator from Colorado says, and a service-pension bill was passed applying to the soldiers who participated in the war with Mexico. Our friends who served from 1861 to 1865 are now demanding very strenuously, and have been for a great many years, that the time has come to pass a service-pension bill putting all the remaining soldiers of the late civil war on the pension rolls who are not there now. I have not yet come to the conclusion that that time has arrived, and for that reason I have not favored it. I feel very sure, Mr. President, that there are some peculiarities connected with the case the Senator from South Carolina referred to. If he lost—

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me right there, the peculiarity consists in this, that here is a man who was on the pension rolls prior to 1860 because he had lost an arm in battle. Then he was dropped by reason of the Confederate war coming on. He did not get on the pension rolls until some time about ten or eleven years ago. I do not recollect the exact year, but it was after the passage of the Mexican service-pension act. He has tried to get a back pension covering the period between the time when his pension stopped and the time when it recommenced, and he has failed. He has tried to get an increase and has failed. I simply ask, as you are amending the pension laws, that the discrimination, if any exists, against Mexican war veterans shall be obliterated from the statute books.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I feel sure that no such discrimination exists. The Senator has stated the case, it seems to me, a little more specifically now than he did in the first place. As I now understand him, this soldier who fought against Mexico lost an arm and was pensioned for that disability.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. He afterwards participated in the civil war against the Union and his pension ceased.

Mr. TILLMAN. He could not have participated much, because the loss of his arm did not allow him to act in any military capacity. He does not pretend to say that he was not in sympathy with the Confederacy and would have fought if he had had his arm. They sent him some statement from the Pension Bureau to sign, and he simply said, "I will not tell a lie to get all the money up there." I have his letter stating that. But he has asked for an increase, and they have turned him down on the ground that he is not in the poorhouse or that his income is sufficient for him and he does not need an increase of pension.

I feel that if he had been a Union soldier he would have got his increase; and as he did fight for the flag once, although he sympathized in the war on it from 1861 to 1865, I think it is time for us to stop the discrimination. He has got but a few years to live, anyway. He is 72 now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I understand—

Mr. TILLMAN. And I am going to appeal to the Senator. I am going to bring in a special bill. I can not get a general law unless he will agree to amend the general law, now that he is proposing to amend it. If he will look into the case I have presented and provide some little amendment that will cover these points, so as to allow the Bureau to take them up rather than have special bills passed, I will be satisfied. But I contend that it is time for the discriminations that existed, if any do exist, against Mexican war veterans to be obliterated from the statute books, and that the few remaining veterans should have the same opportunity to draw Uncle Sam's money and suck the sweet milk of the Treasury as any other ex-soldiers have.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows he has never come to my desk—

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not complaining of the Senator. I trust the Senator will allow me to certify, or rather to bear testimony, to the willingness he has always shown to assist me in any legitimate object I have had before me. There are so few people down our way who ever ask for a pension or for an increase of pension that I have had business before his committee but twice in the four years I have been here.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been a delight to me to have the Senator make a request, and I always respond with alacrity, as I think.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am sure you will in this case.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will, if the case warrants it. This man evidently forfeited his pension under the law. He subsequently, I take it, applied for a pension under the act pensioning the Mexican war soldiers, the so-called service act, which granted $8 a month, and he has now applied, under the amended pension act, for a pension of $12 a month, which specifies that an ex-soldier shall not be entitled to it unless he is unable—

Mr. TILLMAN. On the question of special disabilities to which the Senator has drawn attention—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Chair's pardon that I did not address the Chair first. I sometimes am not as observant of the rules as I ought to be.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am always willing to yield cheerfully to the Senator from South Carolina, but I should like to complete that sentence, because it will not read well unless I do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to say, if I can gather the thread of the narrative, that doubtless this ex-soldier applied under the amended Mexican war pension act for an increase to $12 a month, and his case did not meet the requirements of the amended act, which I think the Senator from Missouri has in his hands, and which I would be very glad to have him read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is as follows:

CHAP. 18.—An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the rolls at $8 per month on account of services in the Mexican war, and who is wholly disabled for manual labor, and is in such destitute circumstances that $8 per month are insufficient to provide him the necessities of life, to $12 per month. Approved, January 5, 1893.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, I will recur to the discrimination which must exist, because here is a one-armed soldier, and under your general provisions in regard to Union soldiers that man must have been entitled to more than this service pension of $8 a month, which is given to a man who has both arms and is simply getting it because he had gone under the flag to fight. As the question of pensions was being discussed, I wanted to call attention to this matter and find out if a discrimination exists, and to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to amend the law while he is amending it so as to do away with it.

Mr. BATE. I should like to know of the Senator from New Hampshire if there is any distinction made in the pension law equivalent to that which is made against the Mexican war soldiers? Does the pauper act just read by the Senator from Missouri apply to any Federal soldier who gets a pension of $6 a month? That is the direct point.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Senator propound his inquiry to me?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would say that in the nature of things it could not well be so, for the reason that the Mexican war pension act is a service-pension act, and we have no other service-pension act on the statute book, unless it be the one that applies to soldiers of the Revolutionary war.

Mr. BATE. He gets only $8 a month, instead of $12. Why should this pauper act apply to the widow of the Mexican war soldier any more than to a Federal soldier's widow? That is the way it stands now. A man has to go and humble himself and say he is a pauper and utterly dependent before he can get an increase of pension from the Government. Is there any instance known under the pension laws where a Federal pensioner has to do that? Is not that a marked distinction between the Federal pension law and the Mexican war pension law, and does the fact of its being a service-pension law justify that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not at all responsible, of course, for the passage of the Mexican war pension law, because I was not in public service at the time it was enacted, and hence I can not speak, perhaps, with definiteness about it, though I might be expected to do so. I can not conceive that in legislating Congress had the least intention of making any discrimination in the act of June 27, 1890, which is not quite a service pension, but which has been called a dependent pension law, and which applies to the soldiers and widows of soldiers of the late civil war. They are required to conform substantially to the same requirements that the Mexican war soldiers are required to conform to under the Mexican war pension law.

It has been charged in a great many places that we have humiliated and insulted the Union soldier by passing that act and making him appear as a pauper in his appeals to this great and rich Government, but I think Congress has meant to be generous always. I think Congress was generous when it passed the service-pension act applying to the Mexican war soldiers. Perhaps the time has come to increase the rate. I am not going to argue that at all. If the proposition is made, I certainly, as a member of this body, will give it sympathetic consideration. It is argued in some quarters that the rate ought to be increased; that the Mexican war pensioners are old, and that the act ought to be amended so as to give them more than $8 a month. But that can only be done by an amendment to that statute. It could not be done to-day.

Mr. BATE. Perhaps the Senator would likewise be in favor of the repeal of that objectionable feature in that law. I know personally several who were Mexican war soldiers; there are two men in the Senate who were Mexican war soldiers and who are importuned constantly by friends making statements of the kind I have suggested, that they do not want to be mortified by pleading the pauper act in order to get an increase of pension. They think they are entitled to it or that they are not. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will favor something that will repeal that part of the law which is objectionable.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it could only be repealed by increasing the rate from $8 to $12 to all Mexican war soldiers. That, of course, would obliterate the feature of the law which does—

Mr. BATE. There are only a few thousand of them left. There are less than 2,000 or 3,000 of the old soldiers, and there are some widows of the old soldiers. The act itself, if I remember, was passed on the 3d of March, 1887, about twelve years ago. I think this remedy ought to be applied.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think if the proposition to increase the pension of the Mexican war soldiers from $8 to $12 per month should be proposed it might receive the favorable consideration of Congress. I do not know how that may be. Personally, I should be strongly inclined to vote for such an amendment. That would get rid of the objectionable feature to which the Senator from Tennessee calls attention. I certainly do not believe that Congress has ever intended to discriminate against the soldiers of the Mexican war in its legislation for the soldiers of the civil war, and certainly I should not be in favor of any such discrimination.

Mr. BATE. It practically applies, I will say to the Senator—The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GALLINGER. Always.

Mr. BATE. Just a word. I say it practically applies to a great many worthy persons who are needy, and I would like to see it done.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will excuse me—I am not at all trying to obstruct him in anything—but will he state again what the bill that he has in his hand proposes, or what he is trying to do?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am trying to do two things, and I hope I shall succeed before I get through. The Grand Army of the Republic have asked for two changes in the act of June 27, 1890, which has frequently been denominated the dependent-pension act. They have asked that a widow who is in possession of an income not exceeding $250 in addition to the proceeds of her daily labor, whatever that may be, may become pensionable under this proposed act. They have asked that in making a rating for an ex-soldier under this proposed act minor disabilities shall be aggregated; that if the soldier has lost a finger, that shall be taken into account; that if he has incurred a disability which perhaps affects his chest, it shall be taken into account, and that a rating shall be made upon his combined disabilities. Of course in no case could the pension exceed $12 a month, the maximum allowed under the law. As I stated before, the President of the United States in his last message recommended the matter regarding the widows, and thought it would be a proper thing for us to amend the law in that particular.

Now, Mr. President, that is all the amendments to the act contemplate as the bill is now before the Senate. I hope it will be allowed to pass, and that if there are wrongs in pension legislation we will take them up at some future time upon the suggestion of Senators or upon amendments offered here or bills presented, and that the defects may be cured.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the bill subject to amendment now?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would the Senator mind incorporating an amendment in it by which the discrimination in favor of the Federal soldiers as against the Mexican war soldiers would be removed? I do not believe any discrimination against the Mexican war soldiers was intended, but still there is a discrimination undoubtedly in regard to these disabilities. Would the Senator mind incorporating a provision that the general practice or law now in regard to disabilities shall apply to all soldiers of the Mexican war as well as to Federal or Union soldiers?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think an amendment of that kind would not be germane to this bill. This bill is dealing with one particular statute, and that statute is the act of June 27, 1890. It has no reference to the Mexican war, and it has reference only to a certain class of beneficiaries.

Mr. TILLMAN. It deals with disabilities, however.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, if the Senator wishes to offer an amendment, I have no objection to his doing it, but I should not know how to amend this bill in the direction the Senator from South Carolina suggests.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of the Senator from South Carolina, but it is going to lead to a pretty general discussion and to quite a radical amendment of the pending bill.

The case referred to by the Senator from South Carolina is not an isolated case by any means. I can recall two cases in my own State of Union soldiers, old men, who have been unable to get out of their chairs for ten or twelve years, unable to get their hands to their mouths, unable to move except as they are assisted by some other person; those men have good records as soldiers; there is not a spot or blemish upon their service, and yet they are not getting to exceed $8 a month. They have appealed again and again in vain to the Pension Office for an increase of their pension. They are, in consequence of their unfortunate condition, practically mendicants and are supported largely at the public expense.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are pensioned under what law?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know what law they are pensioned under. I can not state as to that. These are two cases that have come under my personal observation. I have been able to see those men myself; I have talked with them and observed their conditions. All over the country there are cases of that kind.

One of the great faults of the pension system of the United States is its eternal delay. It is like the case of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce, that perpetually and perennially rolls its slow length along until every litigant and every counsel and every witness is dead.

I would not speak in harsh terms of the Pension Office. I do not want to do that, and I shall not do it; but, Mr. President, is there not clerical force enough in the Pension Office, or can it not be put there, to take these cases up speedily and determine whether they shall be allowed or not, and not permit a great army of dependent men or needy men and needy women and children to die of starvation and of delay? If it is the policy of the Government under this or any other Administration to keep the pension roll at its present figure, let the Administration say so. Do not constantly hold out hope and expectation to these crippled, dependent people that they will receive pensions when there is no purpose to pension them. Let it be said frankly and honestly to them and honestly to the country that they have received all the Government will pay them, and that it is useless to appeal to the Government for any further assistance. I believe a government whose citizens voluntarily come to its rescue in the hour of peril ought to pay them when they are crippled or their health is injured in consequence of their service.

I was thinking a moment ago, when the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire referred to a finger being worth $2, how much a man's whole body would be worth estimated on that basis of calculation. When men left home and went in defense of the flag of their country and its institutions, as these men did in the Mexican war and in other wars, if their health was impaired or if their bodies were wracked with disease or if they lost limbs or were injured, let the Government make them good and whole as far as possible. They are entitled to nothing less; they are entitled to that.

But, Mr. President, above all and beyond all let the Government move speedily in this matter before these people are extinct. It is the delay, the endless, eternal delay, that is the crying evil in the administration of the Pension Bureau of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to say a word, that the Senator from South Carolina may understand the effect of this bill. It seems to me it is a very meritorious bill. I am anxious to see it passed, and I do not mean to talk long enough to prevent its speedy passage.

We have three classes of pensioners. We have those who get their pension because they are entitled under the law existing when they went into the Army, and they get it because they show disabilities incurred in the service. That is one class. Then some years ago there was an appeal for a service pension for the Mexican war veterans. The bill had been before Congress a good many years.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to let me make my statement. Then I shall be glad to hear him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado declines to yield.

Mr. TELLER. I want to make a statement so that it may be consecutive. I shall be glad to hear the Senator when I get through.

Congress then enacted a service-pension law for the Mexican war veterans. Now, that fixed a particular sum, not dependent upon the disabilities of the ex-soldier, and it was nowise under the control of the Department, either to raise or to lower it, no matter what his disabilities might be.

Then, later, there was a great effort—I do not mean here, but outside—for a service pension for the ex-soldiers of the civil war. They came here with a great many petitions, and there was an appeal made. It was said that many of them were in distress, and that was undoubtedly true. Congress, not being willing to grant a general service pension to all the survivors of that war, provided that such of them as were dependent upon their own labor and had disabilities, whether incurred in the war or not, should have a pension. That we have usually, in speaking, called the dependent act of 1890, if I recollect the year aright.

Mr. COCKRELL. The act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. TELLER. The act of June 27, 1890. Now, for the dependents Congress fixed a positive and stated sum, and the Department can not vary it at all; that is, they can not raise it. If the disabilities are not sufficient to come up to $8, they have claimed the right, of course, to fix a lower rate; but they can not make it $50 or $60 or $72, as can be done for complete disability under the law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Twelve dollars a month is the maximum.

Mr. TELLER. Twelve dollars a month is now the maximum; and although he may have incurred these disabilities in the Army, he can get but $12 as a dependent. Now, then, the Mexican war soldier is in the same fix precisely.

Mr. President, I think the criticisms, perhaps, that are made here on the Department are somewhat unjust, because these questions are pretty difficult to deal with. There is a vast army of men applying for pensions, and, in my judgment, the most of them ought to have pensions. I think perhaps the day is not far distant when we shall say to every man who served in the civil war that he shall have a service pension. We are, perhaps, not ready, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, just yet to do it; but that time will ultimately come.

But, as far as I am concerned, I should like to say that I am not alarmed if the Interior Department will allow men to get on the pension roll who do not belong there. I know something from actual experience of the way the work is done in the Department. It was my duty at one time to consider the charges frequently made in this Chamber and other places that the pension roll was stuffed with people who had no right there. After the most careful and exhaustive effort, with all the appliances that the Department could use, without any limit or stint anywhere, we found that there was not one man in two hundred who was there that there was even a suspicion of. I know from my own observation and from the letters I have received for many years and the men with whom I have come in personal contact that there are infinitely more men off the roll who ought to be on than there are men on who ought to be off.

Mr. President, neither am I one of those who are frightened at the fact that we are paying $140,000,000 a year. We had the greatest war of modern times. We had the greatest army of any modern time, and we had the greatest battles. We talk about the battles in South Africa and in other places. Why, Mr. President, look at those who went down in one single engagement. What would be a great army in almost any other part of the world were left dead on the field.

There was no army in the world that ever gave four years of such service as our men gave. There was no other army in the world that ever met such opponents as our men met. There was no army in modern times where the cold steel of the bayonet was used as it was used in the late civil war.

Can men go through those things without lowering their vitality? And when old age comes on them, when the men who ought to be stalwart and strong because they did their service to their country find themselves weak and aged, with a country the richest on the face of the earth, with more untouched measures for taxation and revenue than any other people in the world, with a people that is spending more money than any other people in the world, we ought not to be afraid of doing what we contracted to do when we took these men into our Army.

It is true, Mr. President, you paid a great sum of money, $2,500,000,000, in pensions. You paid it to maintain the honor and the decent character of the nation. You paid $500,000,000 more, or nearly that, in the way of interest to maintain your credit. You paid nearly $500,000,000 more to the public creditors in the way of interest than you have paid to the soldiers who made it possible for these men to get their interest and ultimately their principal. From every section of the country whence comes a complaint, so far as I am concerned, I am prepared to treat it with contempt.

The American people contracted to take care of these men and to compensate them for the disabilities that everybody knew they must incur in a great war of that kind. We will continue to pay it, and no political party can afford for a moment to stand hesitating to do what is justice to those men. Whenever a soldier, I do not care whether he can prove that he incurred his disabilities in the Army or not, is suffering from disabilities, he is entitled to a pension from this great Government of ours.

Mr. President, I believe that there is a disposition in some sections of the country to restrict and to complain that we are putting upon the pension rolls too many men. I believe the time will come when every man who was in the Army who survives to that period will be either on the pension roll or have a service pension, and justice requires that that should be done.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I wish to disclaim absolutely any desire to criticize the Pension Bureau. I have found nothing but courtesy and prompt replies to any inquiries I have made in that Department. I have been led into this debate by reason of the word "disability," which has been brought here to explain why certain legislation is requested. I have endeavored to discover whether there is any discrimination against the Mexican war veteran, or, to change it, whether there is discrimination in favor of the Union veteran and the others are left out. It seems that there is.

The Senator from Colorado says that there are three classes of pensions, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. There are pensions for disabilities, pensions for service simply, and dependent pensions. Now, this gentleman in whom I am interested is certainly suffering a disability, because he lost his arm in battle. He is receiving a service pension and has been denied an increase under the dependent pension rules, because we seem to have legislation here which has provided for pensioning the veterans of the different wars by special acts and there is no general act applying to all classes.

In other words, if there are dependent pensioners under the Mexican war, as I know of one instance, they can not get the provisions applied to their cases that apply to the dependents who fought in the Union Army in the recent civil war. I recall the case of a man in my little town, a Mexican war veteran, who was a paralytic, who was practically dependent on the charity of his neighbors because his pension could not go beyond $12 a month, and those good people nursed him, they clothed him, the physicians attended to him, they buried him, and they never got anything for it except the $12 a month; and it did not cover one-fourth of the expenses per month that that man was to that family and to the neighbors around him.

Now, Mr. President, all I ask is that the chairman of the Committee on Pensions and others here who seem interested in this matter shall remove this discrimination. I do not charge any Senator here with any desire to discriminate, but it has been rather a matter of neglect because nobody has taken it up. I ask that we shall have a general provision in regard to dependent pensions which will apply to all ex-soldiers who are pensionable at all, and that disability pensions shall apply to all ex-soldiers without regard to the war in which they served. That is all I am trying to secure, so that this Government will not by its legislation discriminate against Mexican war veterans, without intending to do it, simply because nobody has thought proper to put it on the statute books that such pensioners shall receive the same treatment and have their pensions regulated by the same laws which govern those who fought in the civil war.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the Mexican war veteran who received his disabilities in the war can get a pension just as a man who received his disabilities in the late war, although I may be wrong on that point. It can only be upon the theory that he has done something which forfeited that right, for the statute certainly gave it to him when he went into the Mexican war.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will, then, simply ask the Senator this question: If by reason of any sympathy with the rebellion, if you prefer that word—if by reason of any service in the rebellion, if you prefer that—can a man who fought for the flag in the Mexican war now come forward and get the same treatment that others get?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that as far as I am concerned I would not make any discrimination. I do not care now at this late hour whether a man served in the war of the rebellion against us or not; if he served in the Mexican war and was disabled in that war, I would still give him a pension.

Mr. TILLMAN. This gentleman did not serve in that war. He was not disabled in that war. He was disabled in the Mexican war, and because of his sympathies, because he would not sign the required papers by which he disclaimed any sympathy for the Confederacy, he has been debarred. But I say it is not right or proper or just or decent that he should be so debarred.

Mr. TELLER. I said if he served in the Mexican war he was entitled to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have one likewise, Mr. President, but before the Senator offers his amendment I wish to make a single observation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator will accept my amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from South Carolina—if the Senator will give me his kind attention—raised the question as to the rate for certain disabilities. I could not answer him offhand, but I have here a table which I prepared some years ago. Amputation at or above elbow or knee is $36; that is, the loss of an arm or leg; but amputation at shoulder or hip joint, or so near joint as to prevent use of artificial limb, is $45. This is a table of rates fixed by law for major disabilities and a table of rates fixed by the Commissioner of Pensions for certain disabilities not specified by law. For the information of the Senate I ask that the table shall be incorporated as a part of my remarks, so that Senators can refer to it when they want to get information on the subject. The table is as follows:

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator give me some more information? Do those rates apply to Mexican veterans?

Mr. GALLINGER. They do, absolutely so, just as much as to those who were disabled in the civil war.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then this man I am interested in can go up here and claim back pay?

Mr. GALLINGER. He can, if he is entitled to it. I do not know the circumstances.

Mr. TILLMAN. According to your statement he is certainly entitled to it, unless there is some statute which prohibits it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not admit anything of the kind. The Senator must not put arguments in my mouth. If his friend, whoever he may be, forfeited his pension by any voluntary act of his, he is not entitled to a pension for the time it was under forfeiture. If a widow who is receiving a pension remarries, she forfeits her pension by law, and it would be absurd to say that she could claim that pension which by her voluntary act she forfeited. I take it that there is a legal reason why this man does not get his back pension.

Mr. TILLMAN. The statement which comes to me officially from the Pension Bureau is that his circumstances were not such when he applied for it as would warrant the increase to $12 a month. But that does not apply to the disability feature at all. He never has been pensioned since the renewal of his pension because of any disability. He has been pensioned simply for service. What I desired to learn from the Senator was whether under the statute which he has just read this man can go to the Pension Bureau and demand that he shall get a pension for disability which his loss of an arm entitled him to, or whether only the Union soldiers can get it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The man has the same rights under the law that any Union soldier has. I am not prepared to say to-day what his rights may be.

Now, Mr. President, one single further observation and I am done, and I hope the bill may pass with such amendments as may commend themselves to the Senate.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] criticised the slowness with which the work of the Pension Bureau is being performed. Why, Mr. President, there are on file to-day in the Pension Bureau 477,239 applications for increase—for increase alone—and a flood of those applications is going off in every mail. In addition to that, every Senator and every member of the House is sending almost every hour of every day calls on the Pension Bureau for information concerning the status of claims. I sent one the other day and I found that my colleague had sent one and each of the two members of the House from my State had sent calls the same day. The ex-soldier had applied to us all. The result was that four clerks were detailed to look up that case. A very large portion of the force is on work of that kind every day of every year.

I think the Pension Bureau is doing the best it can under the circumstances. I do not think there is a member of this body who would like to be in the position the Commissioner of Pensions is in, or who could do any better than the Commissioner of Pensions is doing in the laborious and irksome and thankless task that he has imposed upon him. I presume they are making mistakes, very likely they are making decisions upon technical grounds, and they ought to be broader in their interpretation of the laws, but—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. In just one moment. But my knowledge of that Bureau leads me to the conclusion that on the whole, by and large, the Commissioner of Pensions and his subordinates are doing most excellent work, and are doing work that ought to commend itself to Congress rather than to secure for them the condemnation of any Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will not understand that I am saying anything or alleging anything against the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not so understand it.

Mr. ALLEN. What I said was, or at least what I meant to say was, that if the clerical force in the Pension Bureau is not large enough, let us increase it promptly, so that the cases can be speedily taken up and determined. Then, if the applicant is entitled to a pension, he may derive some benefit from it this side of eternity, and if he is not entitled to it, he will cease expecting and hoping for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is just one difficulty there with which perhaps the Senator from Nebraska is not conversant. I saw the other day an illustration of that where a soldier was granted an increase of pension. I was notified of the fact by the Commissioner of Pensions, and the attorney in the case was likewise notified. The attorney transmitted the fact to the pensioner that he had been granted an increase, and with that he put in a blank form of application for another increase. That is what is going on all over the country to-day. The Commissioner of Pensions has before him to-day a conundrum which I certainly would not want, with twice the help he has in that Bureau, to undertake to solve. It is a very serious proposition. I believe these officers are doing the very best they can under the circumstances, with the amount of money they have at their command.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; and neither am I going to talk any more.

Mr. ALLEN. I merely want to suggest to the Senator this thought, that if, instead of increasing the pensions to applicants a dollar or two dollars a month, the Pension Office should take that case up as a court of equity would take up a case pending before it, examine it thoroughly, examine all the evidence, all the facts, ascertain what the applicant is entitled to at best under the most favorable circumstances, and make the allowance comply with this finding, these repeated applications would not appear so frequently in the Pension Office.

Mr. President, one thought has impressed itself upon my mind in connection with the administration of the Pension Office—I am not speaking now of the present Commissioner, for I think he is doing his duty, as he understands it, faithfully and well—that is what may be called the constant determination or policy of doing nothing.

Mr. President, to dole out pensions in small quantities to applicants who are entitled to recognition at the hands of the Government is not good policy; it is not justice. If a man has been disabled in consequence of his service to the country, let that disability be ascertained to its full extent, and promptly recognize it by allowing him compensation adequate, so far as money can compensate him, for the injury; not start a man who is entitled to twenty-five or thirty dollars a month at seven or eight dollars a month, and then increase two or three dollars from time to time, so as to invite repeated applications from the same person for an increase, but let it come all at once.

These men are growing old. The youngest of them has passed 50 years at this time. If they are ever going to receive relief at the hands of the Government, it is time that relief was extended to them. Their wives are growing to be old women; they are incapacitated to a large extent from performing any duties except the most perfunctory duties of the house. Why keep them hoping and waiting for an increase of their pensions? Why not increase the clerical force in the Pension Office, take up all these cases, and fix the final sum, and fix that sum speedily; or, if they are not entitled to anything, promptly say so to them and put an end to their expectations? It is the delay—that is the thing that is complained of most—it is the endless and ceaseless delay in granting pensions or in determining pension cases that is the evil most complained of by applicants.

The true theory of the law pensioning soldiers and their dependents is that the pension is some slight compensation for injuries sustained in the service of the Government. I know there are those who look upon a pension as a gratuity; but, Mr. President, no government is worthy of a volunteer soldiery that will not compensate the soldier who is wounded or injured in its service, or compensate his widow and children if he loses his life in its service, with some degree of adequacy for the loss they have sustained.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill by striking out in lines 10 and 11 of section 3, on page 3, the words "and an income not exceeding $250 per year," and inserting the words "and having resources from which an income not exceeding $250 per year is derived or derivable."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the language be read as it will stand if the amendment be adopted.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 3, after the word "labor," at the end of line 9, it is proposed to strike out "and an income not exceeding $250 per year," and insert in lieu thereof the words "and having resources from which an income not exceeding $250 per year is derived or derivable," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That if any officer or enlisted man who served ninety days or more in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who was honorably discharged has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow without means of support other than her daily labor, and having resources from which an income not exceeding $250 per year is derived or derivable, or minor children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his army service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the application therefor under this act at the rate of $8 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age; and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend in section 3, on page 4, line 5, after the words "passage of," by striking out the word "this," before the word "act," and inserting the words "the said," and then after the word "act," by inserting "of June 27, 1890;" so as to read:

And provided further, That said widow shall have married said soldier prior to the passage of the said act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that amendment ought to be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMENCEMENT OF WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1478) to repeal so much of the act of June 7, 1888, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, as relates to the commencement of pension to widows under the acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1873. It provides that all pensions which may be granted under the acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1873, to widows in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service of the United States since March 4, 1861, shall commence from the date of the filing of the declarations then on file or which may hereafter be filed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has asked me what will be the effect of this bill. I will read the reason for it from a report which I made from the Committee on Pensions on the 13th day of December:

The Commissioner of Pensions called the attention of the committee to his recommendation on page 21 of his last annual report, from which it appears that while pensions to soldiers commence from the date of filing the claim, pensions to widows date from the death of the husband. The law as to widows was changed in the appropriation act of June 27, 1888, which act removed all limitations as to the date of filing claims. The Commissioner recommends that that provision of the act of June 27, 1888, be repealed, in which recommendation your committee cordially concurs.

That provision in that appropriation act gave widows an advantage over soldiers. The man who fought makes application for a pension. If he gets his pension, he gets it from the date upon which he made the application. The widow makes application; and if her application is allowed, the pension dates back to the death of the husband. It seems to be an injustice. It does not occur to me that a widow should receive a pension beyond the time she applied for it. This amendment is proposed to correct that incongruity in the existing statute.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSTRUCTION OF DEPENDENT PENSION ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 8) construing the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents." It provides that the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," shall be construed and held to include all persons who served for ninety days in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, but shall not apply to those who served in the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Regiments United States Volunteer Infantry who had a prior service in the Confederate army or navy.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the object of that joint resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] reported it, and I have just sent to his committee room for him. As I understand it, under the general law—and I am correct in that—a man who had served in the Confederate army and afterwards accepted service in the Union army and was honorably discharged is pensionable, but under the act of June 27, 1890, there is no provision making that class of soldiers pensionable. This joint resolution simply proposes to extend the provisions of the general law in that regard to the act of June 27, 1890. That is the purport of it, and all there is to it, as I understand it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOID ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill (S. 386) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on public lands and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, January 8, 1900.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 762. An act granting settlers the right to make second homestead entries; and

S. R. 52. Joint resolution to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

S. R. 52. Joint resolution to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution—to the Committee on the Library.

to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

BUSINESS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this day, I believe, is set aside, under the rules, for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. I would ask unanimous consent that next Monday be substituted for to-day for the consideration of that business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that next Monday be substituted for to-day for the consideration of District business?

There was no objection.

ALLEGED POLYGAMOUS OFFICEHOLDERS, UTAH.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit at this time a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is charged and generally believed that John C. Graham, postmaster at Provo City, Utah, a Presidential appointee, is ineligible to hold a Federal office for the same reason that it is alleged Brigham H. Roberts is ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives; and

Whereas it is charged and generally believed that Orson Smith, postmaster at Logan, Utah, a Presidential appointee, is ineligible to hold a Federal office for the same reason that it is alleged Brigham H. Roberts is ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives: Therefore,

Resolved, That said committee of nine members heretofore appointed to inquire into the alleged polygamy of said Brigham H. Roberts shall have power and be directed to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses on oath in relation to said Federal appointees, John C. Graham and Orson Smith, and that after said examination said committee shall report to this House of Representatives whether it is true, as frequently alleged, that said John C. Graham and Orson Smith, Presidential postmasters, respectively, at Provo City, Utah, and Logan, Utah, are now and for some months have been under indictments as polygamists, and whether it is true that at the time of their appointment, more than two years ago, said two postmasters were open and notorious polygamists, and whether or not at the time of their appointment or prior thereto affidavits and papers evidencing such polygamy of both or either one of them were on file.

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 35, have considered the same, and hereby report it with the recommendation that it be amended as follows:

Page 1, lines 1 and 3, strike out the words "said committee of nine members heretofore appointed to inquire into the alleged polygamy of said Brigham H. Roberts" and insert the words "the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads."

And that as amended the resolution do pass.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the only difference, it will be observed, between the resolution as originally presented and the substitute of the Committee on Rules consists of a change of the original resolution which calls for the appointment of a special committee or the reference of the matter to the committee already appointed inquiring into the alleged polygamy of Mr. Roberts. The resolution as amended by the Committee on Rules refers the subject-matter to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, where, under the rule, it properly belongs now. The purpose sought to be secured by the introduction of the resolution will be accomplished, in the opinion of the committee, by this committee more readily and satisfactorily than by a special committee.

Mr. LANHAM. As I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this is not to be referred to the Special Committee on the Roberts Case?

Mr. DALZELL. No; but to the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the offices referred to in the resolution just read are not Presidential offices?

Mr. DALZELL. They are.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. And can not the Executive himself investigate the matter involved in the resolution without the aid of the House of Representatives?

Mr. DALZELL. I should probably agree with the gentleman from Kentucky on that point; but the resolution was introduced calling for the information.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. It was introduced by this side of the House?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. And adopted by a vote of this side of the House?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes. The resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ].

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I can only say that resolutions of this character seem to me to be only political buncombe and should not have consideration by the House of Representatives. The President is quite competent to act in matters of this kind; and I do not think the House should be burdened with such questions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon me a moment, I see that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] who introduced the resolution is not in his seat. But, speaking for myself, I am not able to see any objection to referring in the manner suggested by the Committee on Rules. I think it better that the matter go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, if there is to be an investigation at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the preamble of the resolution will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ROOMS FORMERLY OCCUPIED BY LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presents another privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 28) relating to the use of the rooms lately occupied by the Congressional Library in the Capitol.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That that portion of the rooms and space recently occupied by the Library of Congress in the Capitol building north of a line drawn east and west through the center of the Rotunda shall be used for such purpose as may hereafter be designated by the Senate of the United States, and that portion of such rooms and space south of said line shall be used for such purpose as may hereafter be designated by the House of Representatives.

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred S. R. 28, "relating to the use of the rooms lately occupied by the Congressional Library in the Capitol," have considered the same and report it with the recommendation that it be amended as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following: "That the rooms and space recently occupied by the Library of Congress in the Capitol building shall be occupied and used hereafter for the purpose of a reference library for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives."

And that as amended the resolution do pass.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that report I desire to have read a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, THE LIBRARIAN'S OFFICE.
Washington, December 13, 1892.

SIR: In considering the removal of the main portion of the Library of Congress to the new building, it has always, I believe, been assumed that there would remain, or be replaced, in the Capitol certain books of reference. Indeed, the present appropriation act provides for certain attendants for a "Congressional reference library at the Capitol." The purpose of such reference books would be to give immediate response to such inquiries as, to be answered effectively, must be answered immediately; and second, to aid to the use of the main collection by suggesting authorities in the literature of any given subject.

No Congressional reference library at the Capitol now exists. The Library of Congress is represented there merely by the terminal of the pneumatic tube and book railway. Any books desired from it for the use of members, even for the simplest inquiry, must traverse a distance which, with the request, represents half a mile and a delay of from twenty to thirty minutes.

During the past few months the authorities of the Library have been getting together certain books to form the basis of a reference collection at the Capitol. These are partly duplicates culled from the main collection, and partly the result of purchases which, under the circumstances, I have felt justified in making to the extent of nearly $2,000 from our general appropriation for books. These amount to over 2,000 volumes—encyclopedias, dictionaries, atlases, gazetteers, manuals, and standard reference books, particularly in history and statistics; the best collected editions of the writings of the fathers of the Republic, and miscellaneous material in government, political and economic science. With the above are certain books upon topics likely to be under discussion during the present session, e. g. finance, subsidies, interoceanic canals, colonial administration. These latter constitute a special deposit, which may be changed from time to time as occasion may require.

Together with the above material would be placed the best bibliographic aids that could be furnished, supplying information (1) as to what the Library of Congress contains; (2) as to what is contained in the other libraries of the District; (3) as to what is in print upon any given subject.

In charge of this material would be placed attendants who would offer competent personal assistance to its use and would make requisition upon the main collection for such further material as may currently be required to answer particular inquiries.

Within three weeks the first installment of the above collection will be ready for use. But space for it in the Capitol has yet to be assigned. It will require shelving and space for consultation and administration. The shelving should be open and well lighted, so that members may handle books directly, so far as they care to do so, without the intervention of an attendant. The space assigned should, of course, be convenient to both Houses of Congress.

Details as to the amount of space and facilities requisite I defer until these shall be specifically requested.

A duplicate of this communication has been forwarded to the President pro tempore of the Senate.

Respectfully submitted.

HERBERT PUTNAM,
Librarian of Congress.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have order. This is a matter in which the House is interested.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must ask the House to be in order. This is a matter affecting each one of the members.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, as is well known, the space formerly occupied by the Congressional Library is not now used for any purpose. The Senate have sent over to the House a joint resolution which proposes that this space shall be divided into two equal parts, one part to be assigned to the Senate and the other to the House, and to be disposed of as the respective Houses may see fit.

There has been a great deal of difference of opinion as to what was the most advisable method of disposing of this space, and the Committee on Rules have therefore reported a resolution devoting it to the purposes of a reference library; not so much perhaps with a view to committing the House to that idea, as for the purpose of getting the whole matter into conference, where it may be finally determined in accordance with the views of a majority of both Houses. If the matter should be disposed of in accordance with the report, the question then would go to a committee of conference of the two Houses, who, under the rules of the House and Senate and the terms of the report, would have jurisdiction of the whole matter, to dispose of it as they might see fit.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to know if the Architect of the Capitol has made any estimate of the cost of carrying out the purpose as expressed in the resolution of the Senate.

Mr. DALZELL. In reply, I would say that the Architect of the Capitol has made a plan and an estimate of the cost, as I understand, of carrying out the plan of the Senate, and if the space were divided into committee rooms it would cost $125,000.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear. I desire to call attention to the fact that we are unable to hear what is being said down there in front.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must again request the House to be in order, so that gentlemen may hear the discussion.

Mr. DALZELL. In reply to the gentleman I will state an inquiry was made as to whether or not any estimate was made by the Architect of the cost of carrying out the Senate proposition. As I understand, the Architect has made a plan and has furnished an approximate estimate, and the cost, as he fixes it, would be $125,000. This is a matter, Mr. Speaker, in which the House is quite as much interested as the Senate, if not more interested, and it seems to me that it would not be inadvisable that we should have some expression of opinion.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania the House resolution provides that the space formerly occupied by the Congressional Library shall continue in the form that it is now, and then have a few books placed there for a reference library for the benefit of both the Senate and House.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; I would say to the gentleman that the House resolution simply provides for a reference library. It must be borne in mind, however, that over 800,000 books have been taken out of that old Congressional Library, and a reference library would not probably contain more than 2,000 to 2,500 books.

Mr. HOPKINS. The purpose of the resolution is to devote the entire space formerly occupied by this public library to the proposed reference library now?

Mr. DALZELL. The purpose of the resolution is rather to send the matter to conference in such a shape that the conference committee will have jurisdiction of the whole subject, so as to report not simply in accordance with the Senate resolution nor yet in accordance with the House resolution, but upon some plan that will dispose of the space in the spirit of both resolutions.

Mr. FARIS. We could not hear back here, and I will ask the gentleman what committee reports this resolution?

Mr. DALZELL. The Committee on Rules.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is proposed to connect the reference library and the Congressional Library by means of a pneumatic tube, so that, by visiting the old library, within four or five minutes we could have any book that we felt disposed to order as we did when the Congressional Library was in the old place?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know whether that is contemplated; I have not gone into the detail of the Architect's plan; but will say to the gentleman from New York that we have that now. We have an office in Statuary Hall and a pneumatic tube connection, so that you can now have any book you send for.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The reason I ask this is because we have a library upstairs and another library in here, and if we are to have another reference library, in the old Congressional Library and the Government Library in the new building, it would seem to me we would have a very scattered library? I could understand it if these rooms are required for the use of members of Congress. Frequently a man here needs books of reference very quickly; and if these apartments were set aside for such purpose, it would be possible for a member while debate was running in the House to secure his reference in time to participate in debate. As it is now it seems to me it would be impossible. I remember at one time here, in a discussion concerning the sinking of the Tallapoosa, it was necessary that I should have the files of the New York papers to sustain a statement I had made. Those files were taken from the Congressional Library and placed upon my desk in the House within six minutes from the time they were ordered. Now, if the library of reference should be as useful as the old Congressional Library was, I should be heartily in favor of it; if not, not.

Mr. BABCOCK. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is proposed by this resolution to devote all this space to a reference library?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For a library of 2,000 volumes?

Mr. DALZELL. I would repeat what I said before. The purpose of this resolution is hardly to advocate any particular plan, but to put the House in such a situation that the whole subject may go before a committee of conference, so that the committee may have jurisdiction of the whole subject and make a report upon what may ultimately be satisfactory to both bodies.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand that this entire reference library is already selected and ready to be sent to the Capitol, and it will not occupy more room than the smallest committee room would accommodate. If that be true, it would not want 25 per cent of the space for this purpose, and we do want it for more committee rooms.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I would like to know if there is any suggestion of making a reading room in connection with this reference library?

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear.

The SPEAKER. The House must be in order.

Mr. DALZELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. McCLEARY. As I understand the purpose of the resolution, Mr. Speaker, the outcome of it may be this, that we shall have a part of that space set aside for a reference library and the rest devoted to committee rooms. Am I correct?

Mr. DALZELL. That is right. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas for a question.

Mr. RIDGELY. I have been informed, whether correctly or not, that there are some general changes of the building in contemplation by reason of the removal of the library from this building and other facts, and I would ask if the committee in recommending this matter be referred to the conference committee have that in view?

Mr. DALZELL. That would be the result if the House adopts the resolution.

Mr. RIDGELY. Has the committee consulted with the Architect and other authorities, and have they considered this whole matter in connection with the entire changes of the building?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We want to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the House is in better order than usual. [Laughter.] And yet it is exceedingly essential that all members should hear this discussion about the disposition of the old library room, as it touches the interest of every member; and the Chair trusts that gentlemen will observe order, so that all may hear what is being said.

Mr. DALZELL. In answer to the gentleman from Kansas, I will say that I know of no contemplated changes in the structure of the building outside of what is proposed as to the library space. As far as that is concerned, we have seen the Architect's plans and know his estimates.

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Pennsylvania says that no changes are contemplated in the structure of the building. How does he account for the enormous amount of money asked for in this resolution? I understand the resolution calls for an expenditure of $180,000.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is mistaken; the resolution does not call for anything.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania in his statement explaining his resolution said that that expenditure would be necessary. As a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I have looked into this matter, and have found from investigation and from conversation with the Architect and his assistants that if this space should be devoted to library purposes alone no expenditure of money would be necessary at all.

Mr. DALZELL. That is right.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. On the other hand, the question arises whether it would not be more profitable and economical for the House to acquire property outside, the same as the Senate has done. I believe that we can acquire property outside the Capitol, in the immediate neighborhood, much more cheaply than to go to work and spend $160,000 for fitting up committee rooms. I believe this space ought to be devoted exclusively to library purposes, and perhaps for the purposes of the folding room or the House document room, which now have very unsatisfactory quarters. I will say that at least twenty committees of this House have quarters to-day that are not fit to be occupied as committee rooms. If it is necessary to acquire more committee rooms, I say that the House ought to do what the Senate has already done and acquire property outside the Capitol.

Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether under this resolution the request of the Supreme Court to permit the Supreme Court library to be located in that room can be considered?

Mr. DALZELL. I understand that if the House adopts this resolution, the result will be to throw the whole matter into conference in such a shape that the conference committee may report on any scheme.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The gentleman thinks that the request of the Supreme Court can be considered under this resolution?

Mr. DALZELL. I think so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to say that I for one think the Supreme Court library should be located in that room. I think the court is entitled to good space in the Capitol building, at least until a new court building is erected; and inasmuch as the Supreme Court library is consulted by Members and Senators very often, its convenience to the two Houses is greatly to be desired. We make great use of that library in contested-election cases and in other controversies which frequently arise in the House as to legal points. In addition to that, it seems to me we ought to take into consideration the convenience of the Supreme Court itself. That body is a coordinate branch of the Government and is entitled to large space in this building, and I for one believe that, together with a reference library for Congress, is the disposition which should be made of this library room. I understand there is space enough for both the reference library and the library for the Supreme Court.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY]?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I hope that the committee of conference will do nothing which will devote the space now under consideration to committee rooms alone. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLOTT] is entirely correct when he says, as he does in effect, that if there is to be any relief for the growing demand for committee rooms, that relief must be found outside of this building. The two or three or four or five rooms that we can get in the space recently occupied by the Congressional Library will only meet the requirements of the day and will not meet even those fully—far less those of the future.

I believe with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that the Law Library should be placed in that part of this building. I do not understand that it is the library of the Supreme Court alone, although its most important use is by that court. I understand that this branch of the Congressional Library is used constantly by almost every member of this House, whether he is a member of the bar or not. It ought to be somewhere else than in the dog kennel to which we have relegated it for these many years.

I believe that we ought not to be content with a reference library of two thousand or twenty-five hundred volumes. That is a very small library—covers very little ground. If we get that reference library started, we shall find that it will become not a mere reference library, but a working library; with rooms which can be utilized as reading and writing rooms; and in this way that space will be of great benefit to this House and to the Senate and to the country. I hope that not an inch of this space will be given to private purposes, but that the whole of it will be held for the benefit of the whole House in such a way as appears best for the interests of the country.

Mr. RICHARDSON rose.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] twenty minutes, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I only want a moment or two in which to state what I understand to be the status of this question. To gentlemen who have not investigated the matter I will say that the Senate has passed a joint resolution which divides equally between the Senate and the House the space recently occupied by the old library. The Committee on Rules has reported a substitute for that resolution, providing that this space—all of it—shall be used for a reference library. As stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], it may be that we shall not pass the resolution as we have reported it. The understanding is that in all probability the matter will go to conference, and then after an expression of gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber and after hearing from gentlemen who occupy seats in the other legislative body, Congress will be ready to adopt some plan which will best utilize that old space.

Some gentlemen advocate putting the reference library there with comparatively a small number of books, in order that members may go there and have ready reference to such matters as we need to refer to while measures are pending here and in the other branch. Some gentlemen have favored—and I understand the Supreme Court is very anxious that this proposition shall be carried out—a transfer of the Law Library to that space.

Some gentleman has referred to the fact that our books are very much scattered—that is to say, we have that immense library of over 800,000 volumes across the way, the Congressional Library. We have also the House library up there, with a small portion of these books downstairs. The Senate has also its separate library just as we have. And then there is the Law Library downstairs. So that we have, in fact, three or four separate libraries in this building.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we make another reference library it seems to me it will not be long before we shall have half of the Congressional Library back in this building. There will be a greater and greater demand for books, because when you begin to make references one reference calls for another—a reference in one book requires you to follow that reference up in another book—so that in a short time, as I have just said, we shall have half of the Congressional Library back in this building.

Now, that space has been arranged expressly for library purposes, and it seems to me best that we shall keep it for such purposes. But the object in passing this resolution will be to bring the matter hereafter before us, so that upon the report of the conference committee the question will be presented in such a condition that Congress may make the best disposition of this space.

Some gentlemen think this space should be devoted to a restaurant.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Tennessee points out the fact that in the utilization of this space for library purposes we shall move back as we want them a large number of books from the Congressional Library to this building. Well, sir, what is the harm? If we need the books, why not have them here?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We have already gone to an enormous expense in making a tunnel from this building to the main library, and in four or five minutes we can get from there any book we wish.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Oh, it takes a great deal longer than that—sometimes nearly half an hour.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have made the experiment, and am able to say that in seven minutes I have had books brought to me from the Congressional Library. Thus we now have access to that entire library, and it seems to me that this is better than undertaking to have another library started in the space where the old Congressional Library was.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if there is not, in his opinion, space enough in the room already provided upstairs for the reference library of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think there is. It is already shelved and ready for the purpose, and we have quite a large number of books up there now.

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask my colleague from Tennessee a question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] speaks of some architect making an estimate. Now, what architect has made such an estimate?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. GAINES. An employee of the Government at this time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; not an outsider, but one employed by the Government.

Mr. GAINES. Gentlemen have spoken also of building an establishment for the use of the Supreme Court of the United States. I would like to ask my colleague what plans, if any, have been devised for that purpose?

Mr. RICHARDSON. A number of bills have been introduced and are pending for the purpose of condemning property and erecting a building for the use of the Supreme Court.

Mr. GAINES. And they would also want a library?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Undoubtedly; if these plans should be adopted, the court would want a library in that building.

Mr. GAINES. Then if we move the reference library of the court to the new location, and subsequently erect a building for the Supreme Court, we would have to make another move in the future?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think so.

Mr. LLOYD. I would like to ask the gentleman with reference to the pending resolution: If this matter is submitted on the conference report of the two Houses, is it not a fact that we would be required, under the rule, either to accept or reject that proposition as an entirety? In other words, it could not be amended.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly; but of course they could vote the whole proposition down.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, if I should be on such a committee I should be willing to place the matter in such shape as to have the fullest expression of sentiment on the part of the House in dealing with the final issue. It is a matter of great importance and of vast interest to all the members, and ought to have full consideration.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true, also, that this special library plan—or reference library plan—if adopted would require additional employees of the Government to take control of it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Unmistakably; that would be the result.

Now, a word about the space to which reference is made in the resolution. If used for committee rooms, it would give 14 working rooms to the House and 14 to the Senate, making 28 in all. I believe it is a matter of fact that a number of the committees of the House are now meeting two, and possibly three, in the same room. This, I believe, we might obviate by taking the 14 new rooms which this old library space will enable us to acquire. But these are all matters for the House and individual members to consider and submit such ideas as they may entertain in regard to the best way to deal with the question.

I yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who wants four or five minutes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree in the view submitted here that this resolution should go to the conference committee for the purpose of having a proper plan prepared and digested for the utilization of the space in question. I do not think, for my part, that we should devote that space to committee rooms. I think there are more important objects to be gained. The expenditure of $150,000 or $175,000 required to make the changes would go far toward securing a space or at least to prepare a building for the committee purposes for the House—a space sufficient for the use of the House and for the Senate.

I am in hopes that the conference committee on this resolution, when appointed, will consider carefully the various suggestions made by the members of the House and the Senate. I believe that this space should be devoted to the general use of the House and the Senate; that it should be used for a reference library, for reading rooms, and for assembly rooms, where members of the House and the Senate can meet and talk together over matters of public interest of both Houses.

We know that during the last year a plan was suggested for dividing this space into three large rooms for the use of the House of Representatives, and the room on each side was to be devoted to the uses of the two parties. I was in favor of that proposition at the time, and I think it was the sentiment of the House, largely because it gives a concentrated space for debate that would not be devoted, as it now is, to conversation, but to debate, and at the same time give ample space to the two parties in the assembly rooms on each side to engage in conversation and to talk of matters of mutual interest. Now we have to adjourn for this purpose to the stuffy cloakrooms of the House in order to avoid disturbing the House when engaged in deliberation. It seems to me that this space should be devoted exclusively to the uses of the House and Senate for the purpose indicated; that it should be used jointly by the two Houses, and very little change in the architectural conditions would be required, and that it should be thus devoted not simply for a reference library alone, but for reading rooms, writing rooms, and conversation rooms, and for the general purposes that the members of the House and the Senate may find desirable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Tennessee controls an hour and the gentleman from Pennsylvania an hour, as the Chair finds that the previous question was not asked for.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is an amendment in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield for that purpose?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield for any debate the gentleman desires, but I do not think that I have the right to yield for an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee the gentleman from Colorado could not offer an amendment at the present time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I wish to offer the amendment at the proper time; that is all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado to allow him to address the House.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have offered, or which I wish to offer when the proper time comes, adds to the resolution as it now is the words:

And for that part of the National Library known as the Supreme Court library.

Upon examining the resolution, I have grave doubts, if it goes to conference, whether the conferees would have jurisdiction to include a project to have the Supreme Court library located in that space, and on that account I would like to offer this amendment at the proper time. Inasmuch as the Supreme Court library is now located in a very dark part of the Capitol, almost a dungeon, some of the windows being under the portico, which extends far out, and it being difficult to get light there by which to read, it seems to me that we ought to give them adequate space; that we ought to give them this room for their library, and retain a portion for a small reference library for Congress. I do not believe that the space would make enough committee rooms to do much good, at least not that part of it which would be devoted to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say to the gentleman that it will give fourteen large committee rooms, I think.

Mr. SHAFROTH. On both sides?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Fourteen rooms on each side.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, but it will cost $140,000 to have the architectural changes made.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, that is true; and, as I understand it, the change for the Supreme Court library would only cost the amount necessary to move the books and minor improvements.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That would be very small, indeed; whereas dividing it into fourteen rooms would cost, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has indicated, something like $140,000.

Mr. DALZELL. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me we ought to give the space to the Supreme Court library, or at least the larger part of it, because that library is constantly used as a reference library by Senators and Members of Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What will you do, then, with the space now occupied by the Supreme Court library? There would be an expense connected with the fitting up of that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That space is not large. It might be devoted to committee rooms, but it would not make more than three or four committee rooms, and the expense of cutting it into such committee rooms would not exceed probably $5,000. We are continually consulting that library, and it seems to me that to devote that space to the Supreme Court library and a reference library would be a wise disposition of the same.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to let me use a little time now. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair desires to know from the gentleman from Tennessee whether he has given his consent that the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] may be considered as pending?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I was not asked to do so. As I understand it, the gentleman desires to offer his amendment simply to give the conferees, if the matter should go to conference, jurisdiction over the subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is all. My amendment does not require the conferees to make that disposition of the space.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I feel quite sure that the conferees would have jurisdiction of the whole question as to the disposition of that space if it should go to conference, and therefore the amendment would not be necessary.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have looked at the proposition and I do not think so. For that reason I should like to give them jurisdiction.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It relates to the disposition of the space.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but it confines them, as I understand it, to a reference library.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I think not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that consent to have the amendment pending has not been given by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I have not seen the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. I desire to yield a few moments to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the pleasure of hearing what has been said by gentlemen touching this matter. I understand, however, that there is under consideration a proposition touching the disposal of the space formerly occupied by the Library of Congress, and that this is a proposition to send the Senate joint resolution to conference. I think it ought to go into conference with plenary power on the part of the House conferees to act with the Senate conferees touching the final disposition of this space; and I believe that is all I want to say about it—that this space ought to be utilized for a reference library for the use of the House and the Senate.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the Law Library.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman from Minnesota says "the Law Library." I have no objection even to include that, provided the Law Library is a part of the reference library and second thereto. I can only speak of my own experience touching the want of a reference library in this building. When the Library of Congress occupied these rooms they were convenient to all of us, and the Librarian in charge and his assistants were in a position, on a minute's notice, to give information to Members and Senators. It may be said that we have gotten a tunnel from here to the Library building, across some little distance from the Capitol. That is true. But it is a tunnel that I have never been able to use successfully. I am not able to go through it myself; and I had just as well be frank about it, and call myself something near an average member. I know what I want when I want something.

Now, I might sit down and make my memorandum and send it speeding through the tunnel to some gentleman clerk at the other end of the tunnel that I have never seen. He finds something that he suspects will answer my query, and back it comes through the tunnel. It is not what I want at all. I want somebody that I can go to in charge of a reference library. If I want one item of information, he knows exactly where to find it, even when I do not know where to find it, and that book, containing that information, will be returned in a few minutes dog-eared for my use. Somebody will say, "You ought to know where to find the information." I am speaking as an average of the membership of the House touching these matters.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is flattering himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I must claim that much, I think, as a right. [Renewed laughter.] Now, these rooms, I understand, are thoroughly furnished. I suppose it would cost $100,000 or $200,000 to take these rooms and take the library furniture out of them; and if the rooms are used for anything else than a library this furniture must be taken out and thrown away. If you were to convert them into committee rooms I have no doubt that the necessity for a reference library within ready call of the House and Senate would be so speedily recognized that within a year or two, or a very short time in the future, both branches would go back to the use of that space for a reference library. Now, that is about all I want to say, and I say it for the purpose of indicating my own views and not with a view of fettering by direct resolution or action of the House the discretion of the House conferees. I suppose from what little I have heard that this was in the nature of an experience meeting at which each brother might state what was his view touching this matter. You may have a whole world of information in the mind of somebody that can give it in a short space of time, and it does not benefit this body or the other or any individual who may want it, unless you get what you want at the proper time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee has consented to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to hear it reported. I think it only broadens the scope of the resolution.

Mr. BARTHOLODT. I ask for the reading of the original resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to hear it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee amendment so that it will read as follows:

"That the rooms and space recently occupied by the Library of Congress in the Capitol building shall be occupied and used hereafter for the purpose of a reference library for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives, and for that part of the national library known as the Supreme Court library."

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a few moments.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope this resolution will be adopted, and trust that the adjustment reached by the committee of conference will be such that the whole space formerly occupied by the Congressional Library will still be reserved for library purposes. It is very evident to those who have any experience in the matter that the books in this building and in the Library are not as valuable to members as they should be. In order to make good use of a library it is not only necessary that there should be books, but that they should be promptly available. Now, what I should like to see would be an arrangement whereby the whole of this space formerly occupied by the Congressional Library would be occupied by the Senate library, which is large and valuable; by the library of the House of Representatives, the Supreme Court library, and a general reference library. Each would have to have its own separate librarian. I am informed that the Librarian has already selected 8,000 or 10,000 volumes for a reference library. There is no probability that any considerable share of the Congressional Library would be brought over here. Most of the books there are not such as would be required in a reference or working library. I think it perfectly safe to say that 10,000 to 12,000 volumes from the Congressional Library—many of them duplicates—would be ample to afford members an opportunity to give prompt consideration to the subjects arising here. It is not sufficient to have books to be reached at the end of a tunnel in five, ten, or fifteen minutes. It is very desirable to have a reference library in this building and a librarian who is posted as to the subjects we are called upon to consider.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. You think, then, that 12,000 books would be as many as needed?

Mr. BURTON. I think that number would be enough for a reference library.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman must remember that there is space there for 700,000 books. The old Congressional Library numbered about 700,000 volumes. Now, there is space enough there for that number, because they were there before they were moved. If you only put in ten or twelve thousand books, you would have a great deal of space that was not utilized.

Mr. BURTON. But the Senate library is a large library, and the Supreme Court library is also a large one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman means that those books would be in addition to the ten or twelve thousand?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; the books belonging to the Congressional Library, the gentleman from Tennessee will remember, were many of them piled up in their former quarters like so much old lumber, so the number of volumes there was not a fair test of the capacity of the room for library purposes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether in the number of ten or twelve thousand he includes the Executive documents, which are quite necessary for reference?

Mr. BURTON. That would be an additional number.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Would it not be well also to have the House library, which now occupies so much space, moved down there, so as to afford additional room on the next floor.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; for committee rooms upstairs. I think that could be done and retain where it now is the small library adjacent to this room.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have already alluded to the fact that when the old library was in this building I got three copies of different New York newspapers within six minutes, giving a detailed account of the sinking of the Tallapoosa. Twenty-five minutes ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] wrote asking for a copy of the second volume of Henry Adams's History of the United States. I would like to hear a report from the gentleman from Massachusetts as to his success in obtaining it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I just heard a moment ago that the book was out. That was the first recognition of my request.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be various ideas as to utilizing this space. One view is that it should be used for committee rooms. I do not concur in that view, because I think it is pretty evident that after we have utilized the portion of that space allotted to the House for committee rooms we shall inevitably have to provide additional committee rooms somewhere else. It is estimated that it will cost $125,000 to prepare this space for committee rooms. If we must incur such an enormous expense, we had better go at once and purchase a building, as has been done by the Senate. Now, it is proposed also to use it as a reference library; and, by the way, I wish to suggest to those who do not concur that that is the proper use to make of it that if the Senate concurs in the amendment proposed by the House, that ends the question, and it will be used for the purpose of a reference library.

But I am not in favor of devoting it to a library. I believe that it facilitates matters to have the library practically all in one place, reasonably accessible to this body. I believe in the main that when members desire the use of any volume they can secure it more readily by the use of the pneumatic tube arrangement that we have than they could if we should locate a reference library in this space formerly occupied by the Congressional Library.

Now, there is a use to which this space can be very well put. I happened to be in the last Congress upon the committee whose attention was called as to the rearrangement of the space now used as the hall and cloak rooms. There was a pressing demand for some space in which each side of the Chamber might hold conferences, and it seems to me that this space might be very well used for that purpose. That side of the House finds itself constantly in need of some place where they may meet in party conference, and this side finds the same condition.

Now, it seems to me that the wise thing to be done with this space is to set it apart, or so much of it as may be necessary, for this particular purpose. I am not in favor of using it for a law library, for I believe that within five years we shall have a new judiciary building, and it would be unnecessary work to move the law library into this space and within five years move it into a new building.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought to use this space for the purpose.

first, of providing consultation rooms for committees of conference of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to the substitute recommended by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Without objection, I would like to hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute reported by the committee so as to read as follows: "That the rooms and space recently occupied by the Library of Congress in the Capitol building shall be occupied and used hereafter for the purpose of a reference library, for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives, and for that part of the National Library known as the Supreme Court library."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The substitute of the committee as amended was agreed to, and the resolution of the Senate as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON INSULAR AFFAIRS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Insular Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound such documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with the subjects considered or to be considered by the said committee during the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin also offered, by unanimous consent, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Insular Affairs or any subcommittee thereof be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House of Representatives and during any recess thereof.

UNITED STATES ARMY IN IDAHO.

Mr. GROSVENOR, from the Committee on rules, reported back with amendment the following resolution introduced December 8, 1899, by Mr. LENTZ:

Whereas it is a matter of general information given out by the public press, and charged by the industrial organization known as the Western Federation of Miners, that United States troops have been sent into the State of Idaho in defiance of and contrary to the provisions of Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, in that it was done at the individual request of the governor of Idaho, without the authority of the legislature, and at a time when there was no condition of insurrection or riot, and when the legislature could have been called together without danger or delay from any source whatever, and, further, without even consultation by the governor with the sheriff of Shoshone County, where it was desired that the troops should be and actually were sent; and

Whereas in defiance of section 9, Article I, of the Constitution martial law was declared and the writ of habeas corpus suspended in said county in a time of profound peace, when there was no condition of rebellion or invasion or any menace to the public safety; and

Whereas it is charged that Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam, commanding the troops in Shoshone County, arbitrarily, and without warrant of law, without informing the accused of the charge upon which they were arrested, and in defiance of the sixth amendment to the Constitution, arrested and imprisoned hundreds of citizens of the United States and of the State of Idaho, and held them prisoners under the most brutal and tyrannical conditions, denying to them their constitutional right to speedy trial by an impartial jury of the State, which right the Constitution clearly guarantees; and

Whereas it is charged that the said Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam did, in defiance of and contrary to the provisions of the fourth amendment of the Constitution, subject the persons, houses, papers, and effects of citizens to unreasonable and arbitrary search and seizure; and

Whereas it is charged that the said military commander arbitrarily, and in defiance of the civil law, ordered the arrest of the sheriff of the county and the board of county commissioners, and subsequently deposed them from office on the unproved pretext of neglect of duty; and

Whereas it is charged that the said Brigadier-General Merriam, immediately upon the arrival of the troops, ordered the arrest of every man who was a member of the miners' union, and also of all citizens who were supposed to sympathize with the cause of organized labor; and

Whereas it is charged that those citizens were imprisoned in what was known as the "bull pen," a place unfit for human habitation, and that so brutal and degrading was the treatment inflicted on these prisoners by Brigadier-General Merriam and the United States troops under his orders that one unfortunate man became insane, and upon being taken to the county jail he broke from his guards and jumped into the river, and a negro soldier, at the command of the Bunker Hill Mining Company's doctor, fired three shots at him and he was dragged from the river dead, and that another unfortunate prisoner, dying in the "bull pen," begged for a priest and his dying request was denied; and

Whereas the imprisoned citizens were denied opportunity to confer with their counsel or members of their families and were denied the right of speedy and impartial trial; were held in this vile and inhuman imprisonment for several months without charge or indictment against them, although two sessions of the grand jury were held in the meantime, and during their confinement were treated by the officers and soldiers of the United States Army as convicted felons and compelled to work at penal employment; were subjected to cruel and degrading punishments, such as being compelled to sleep on bare boards, placed on a diet of bread and water for ten days, and compelled to stand erect seven hours each day in the hot sun under penalty of death if they attempted to move or sit down. These two latter unlawful punishments were inflicted upon them by the orders of Captain Edwards, United States Army, who amused himself by calling the prisoners "cowardly curs;" and

Whereas it is charged that by the use of the military power the writ of habeas corpus was suspended for months in Shoshone County, and the right of free speech, free press, and peaceable assemblages were denied to the peaceable citizens of that community without any excuse or justification whatever; and

Whereas when the Industrial Commission sat in Wallace all union men who had been long residents of the county were in the "bull pen" and had no opportunity to appear before the commission; others were arrested while on their way to Wallace to appear before the commission and thrown into the "bull pen" until after the commission adjourned; and

Whereas it is charged that the following proclamation, in gross violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the constitution and statutes of the State of Idaho, was issued and enforced by Brigadier-General Merriam, to wit:

"PROCLAMATION."

"Whereas the following notice has been served upon the mine owners of Shoshone County by the duly constituted State authorities, by whom martial law has been declared, to wit:

"To the mine owners of Shoshone County:

"Certain organizations or combinations existing in Shoshone County have shown themselves to be criminal in purpose, inciting and, as organizations, procuring property to be destroyed and murders to be committed, by reason whereof it has been twice necessary to declare martial law in Shoshone County.

"You are therefore notified that the employment of men belonging to said or other criminal organizations during the continuance of martial law must cease. In case this direction is not observed your mines will be closed."

"Therefore, in order to carry into effect the spirit of the foregoing notice and restore the industries of the district as far as possible, it becomes necessary to establish a system by which miners who have not participated in the recent acts of violence and who are law-abiding people may obtain work, and, that order and peace may be established, the following is promulgated for the guidance of all mine owners and employees in the affected district:

"All parties applying for underground work in any of the following mines will be required to obtain from Dr. Hugh France, the duly appointed and authorized agent for the State of Idaho for this purpose, or his deputy, at Wardner or at Wallace, a permit authorizing said person to seek employment in any of the following mines: Bunker Hill and Sullivan, Last Chance, Empire State-Idaho, Consolidated Tiger and Poorman, Hecla, Mammoth, Standard, Helena-Frisco, Gem, Morning, Hunter, and such others as may be hereafter included in the above list. "Mine owners must refuse employment to all applicants for underground work who do not present a duly signed permit authorizing the same. Such permit will be deposited in mine owners' office, subject to periodical inspection.

"All parties now under employment by any of the mines above named will be required to procure, within ten days from this date, the permits above referred to as a condition to their remaining in the service of their respective companies.

Whereas it is charged that during the months when a great portion of the male citizens of Shoshone County were thus unlawfully held in imprisonment by the United States troops the wives and families of the said citizens were subjected to insult and outrages by the soldiers of the United States stationed in that county; and

Whereas said outrages above described, as perpetrated by the United States Army and its officers, are an intolerable abuse of the rights of citizens and a dire menace to the perpetuity of free institutions and the liberty of citizens; Therefore,

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,000 copies of so much of the civil report of Maj. Gen. John R. Brooke, military governor of the island of Cuba, made to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, with accompanying papers and documents, as is in the English language, together with a prepared index; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

Second. His recommendation as to further topographical and geological surveys on said islands.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish to the Senate a list of all transport ships and other vessels purchased or chartered by the War Department since March 4, 1897; their names respectively, if named; the name of the person, persons, company, or companies from whom purchased or chartered; the value of each transport ship or other vessel, whether purchased or chartered, as estimated by Lloyd's Register at the time of the purchase or charter thereof; the price paid for each transport ship or other vessel, and, where acquired under the terms of a charter party, the amount paid the owner, owners, or agents of the transport ship or other vessel so acquired while under charter; the amounts expended by the War Department in fitting up and repairing said transport ships and other vessels, whether chartered or owned by the United States during the period they have been used by the War Department; also the number and names of transport ships or other vessels sold by the War Department, the name of the person or persons or company or companies to whom sold, the price for which each transport ship or other vessel was sold, and why the same was sold.

INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HOAR. I offer a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all communications which have been received by him, or by any department or officer, civil or military, from Aguinaldo or any other person undertaking to represent the people in arms against the United States in the Philippine Islands, or any alleged government or public authority of said people; and all replies to such communications.

Also the proclamation sent by him to be issued to the people of the Philippine Islands, as actually directed by him to be issued, and the same as actually proclaimed by General Otis if in any respect it was altered or any part of it was omitted.

Also to inform the Senate whether any approval or disapproval was expressed by his authority, or that of the War Department, of such change, if any.

Also all constitutions, forms of government or proclamations issued by Aguinaldo, or any congress or legislative assembly, or body claiming to be such, or convention of the people of the Philippine Islands or any part thereof, or claiming to represent them or any part thereof, of which information may have come to him, or to any department of the Government.

And that the President be further requested to communicate without delay so much of said information as is now in his possession or in that of any department at Washington, without waiting to obtain so much of said information as may require considerable delay or communication with the Philippine Islands; and to communicate the remainder of the information as soon thereafter as it can be obtained.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to state, if I may, before unanimous consent is asked, that this resolution proposes that we shall have by itself in a distinct shape the State papers, the proclamations, constitutions, and other documents of that kind in which the Philippine Islanders have undertaken to establish and proclaim a government, and the communications they have made or sought to make to the United States Government declaring their purposes and the replies. A great deal of the information which I ask is to be found scattered already in military reports and in other documents, but it will be convenient to all of us to have it in one shape by itself. Probably there may be some little matters which they would have to send out to the Philippine Islands for, but with that exception it can all, I presume, be sent to the Senate within a few days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. I believe we are to consider to-morrow a resolution which has gone over until that day which involves in some of its phases the general subject of inquiry by the Senate into matters relating to the Philippines; and I think the resolution had better be printed and go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. Well, unless the Senator sees for himself on the statement made that it is one of those things which, according to the unbroken usage of the Senate, is granted on the request of any Senator. I think it is. If the Senator objects, the resolution goes over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. PETTIGREW. To-morrow is to be devoted, after the routine morning business, to eulogies on the late Vice-President of the United States, and therefore it seems to me proper that the resolution of inquiry which I offered, together with the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], be put over until the next day and that in the meantime it shall lie on the table. I therefore ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. I hope that request will be granted, Mr. President. I think it better that all the resolutions of inquiry relating to the Philippines should go over until Thursday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. What is the order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is ordered, by unanimous consent, that the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota, with the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which was assigned for consideration after the routine business for to-morrow morning, be postponed until Thursday.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. My colleague stated that it was his desire that all such resolutions of inquiry should stand over in the same way; and the Chair announced that that was the consent given. I wish to know whether the consent embraces all such resolutions or only the one just stated by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It did not, as the Chair put it; but the Chair will put it in the other form, that the consideration of all the resolutions will be postponed until Thursday, if there be no objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I was intending to ask in addition that the same order may be made as to all other resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. RAWLINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the Philippines is hereby instructed to inquire into and report to the Senate:

1. What, if any, form of government, insurgent or revolutionary, or in the form of a dictatorship, other than the Kingdom of Spain, existed in the Philippine Islands on and prior to December 10, 1898; and to what extent did such government have and exercise dominion, control, or influence in said islands, and to what extent the Kingdom of Spain had actual possession or control therein at and prior to said date.

2. Can sovereign power be justly and in accordance with international law claimed in the absence of actual power of control?

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Philippines be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,500 per annum until otherwise provided by law.

HENRY W. LEE.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate what action has been taken by him under the act of Congress of August 23, 1894 (28 Stats., 1013), for the relief of Henry W. Lee, with copies of all the papers in the case.

INDIAN LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to furnish to the Senate the reports made to his Department under authority of statute, approved March 1, 1899, providing for an investigation of affairs connected with the estimating and sale of the pine timber and lands of the Chippewa tribe of Indians in the State of Minnesota, and other data bearing upon the same subject, together with any orders or directions issued by him relating to the estimating or sale of such timber and lands, and the future management thereof.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate and delivered to the Senate document room 1,000 copies of H. R. 1, with amendments as proposed January 4, 1900.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, some days ago I introduced a bill for the Government ownership of the railroads of the United States. I now present an article on public ownership by Prof. Frank Parsons, which I wish to have printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce to accompany the bill which I introduced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that a statement submitted by him may be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. SEWELL. Before that order is made, I should like to have some knowledge as to what it is. The practice of printing at the public expense the ideas of some cranks in the country is getting to be a little too common. I object to the printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey objects.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to the reference of the paper without printing.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not ask for its reference without printing. It is simply an essay upon the subject of the Government ownership of public utilities in the United States by Prof. Frank Parsons. He is one of the ablest writers in this country and one of the soundest, and he does not belong to the list of cranks under any circumstances. Further than that, there can be cranks on both sides of this question and quite often there are, and they are as liable to represent the great corporations of the country as not to represent them.

Mr. SEWELL. I object, Mr. President, anyway, to the printing of articles by individuals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to make a personal appeal to the Senator from New Jersey not to object. I am in receipt from time to time of letters from young men connected with our colleges who are debating this question, or who desire to debate it, asking me for data, which I have found it very difficult to supply. One document, I think, that emanated from the Interstate Commerce Commission contains some information on the subject, but it is rather difficult to obtain it.

While I do not know precisely what this professor, who is vouched for by the Senator from South Dakota, may have contributed to this subject, and while I have heretofore been opposed to the Government going into the business of buying railroads and telephones and telegraphs, yet it is a great public question; one that has formerly concerned other countries. There has been some legislation on the subject abroad, and I think we are entitled to all the information we can obtain. In view of the fact that we have been printing almost anything and everything Senators have heretofore asked for, I think it is in the line of the public interests that this document should be printed and become available for distribution.

I hope the Senator from New Jersey will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I am not disposed to do so at the present time. If these articles have anything to commend themselves to the people of the United States, they will appear in public prints and in the magazines. The owners of the magazines are very anxious to print able articles on any subject. I do not think we ought to order such printing to be done at the public expense, because then the matter is distributed with a frank. The Senator from South Dakota has made two or three of these requests in the last few days, and I think it is about time that we stopped the practice.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, there are many public questions that are of great interest to the entire people. The opinions of members of the House and Senate are printed as documents and go in the RECORD and can be franked to the people of the country. There are men outside of Congress just as competent to discuss these questions as the men inside, and for one, when a member of the Senate believes that an expression given to the public by any citizen is worthy of especial attention and care, I can see no reason why it should not be printed and distributed through the mails and read by the people. It seems to me that only a fear of having the people educated on these great questions can inspire a disposition to suppress this sort of information. I have seen a number of instances of refusal here, especially refusals to the Senator from South Dakota, to have papers printed which were of unusual interest and deserved to be printed as public documents. For one I do not understand the spirit with which this crusade is made against the printing of such information. I should like to see the old order of things, that has stood here for years without doing anybody any harm, restored, so that whenever any Senator has a paper which he believes to be of such importance as to justify its printing as a document he may ask unanimous consent to have it so printed, and it may be done.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, is it in order to move to print the paper as a document? I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. I object to its consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be allowed, as other Senators have been, to make one suggestion to the Senator from New Jersey. I agree with him entirely that the practice of printing articles composed by persons outside of the Senate ought to be very carefully watched and guarded, but while it is being carefully watched and guarded it is a great advantage to the Senate occasionally, because with our rule of unlimited debate every Senator has a right to address the Chair and incorporate any such article in his remarks, and public business has to stop, no other public business, at any rate, can be transacted, while that is being done.

Every one of the ninety Senators has a right under our rules to do this, and I take it for granted that no Senator will needlessly ask the Senate to print a document in this way, a document which, if it could not be printed in this way under his responsibility as a Senator, he can incorporate in his remarks and have printed in the RECORD at much larger expense, and the power of sending it by mail under frank would still exist. So this practice has grown up, not only out of respect to the character of the Senators and the presumption that no Senator would ask for such information except in a grave and serious case, but also to protect the Senate against what must be an enormous prolongation of our debates.

I hope that these views may impress themselves on the Senator from New Jersey, before the question comes up again, as worthy, at any rate, of his consideration. I do not wish to interfere, of course, with his discretion in the matter and his right to object to the printing. It seems to me that we would find the other rule very awkward and inconvenient.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Of course, under the practice of the Senate, I have a right to ask unanimous consent to have a paper printed as a document. Any Senator has a right to object. Therefore I have no criticism to make of any Senator if he exercises that right. The Senator from New Jersey has chosen to object. It is proper that he should object if he wishes to do so. But the paper which I presented is somewhat outside of the usual rule. I introduced a bill, quite an elaborate bill, which provides for the Government ownership of the railroads of the United States. That bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I think it is the first that has been introduced in this body upon that subject; and yet it is a great question, one that is meeting the consideration of the people throughout the world. Most of the governments of the world own the whole or a part of their railroads. Outside of the United States more miles of railroad, many thousand miles more, are owned by the governments of the world than are owned by private corporations.

For the purpose of getting these facts before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, some days ago I introduced and asked to have printed as a document a very elaborate compilation upon this subject, and a very earnest argument in favor of the passage of the bill. I also introduced and asked to have printed as a document the speech of Judge Clark, of North Carolina, before the convention of railroad commissioners at Denver last summer. It was an excellent document, full of valuable information, and this morning I have offered an essay written by Prof. Frank Parsons, who is one of the most distinguished students in America upon this subject and is well known as a writer to almost every one who has studied economic questions. It is full of valuable information; it ought to be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce for their information upon this subject. If it can not be printed in the usual way, I shall try to get it before the Senate in the other proper method, and I shall incorporate it in some remarks which I shall make upon the subject, which will enable me not only to frank it through the mails, but make it part of the records of the Government.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I objected—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the Senator from New Jersey proceeding? The Chair hears none, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. SEWELL. I objected to the printing of the paper as a document without any reference to what may be its value, or anything of that kind. I object to printing such papers as public documents so that they may be sent free through the mails. I have no objection generally to the question being taken up tomorrow, if the Senate wish it done.

The Government ownership of railroads is a subject which involves twelve or fifteen billions of dollars, and is something that we are not likely to arrive at for a good many years from this time. But that has nothing to do with the question. The main objection I have to the matter is the idea of offering, as the Senator from South Dakota has on two or three occasions lately, papers written outside and asking to have them printed at the public expense, thereby getting the benefit of the franking privilege.

Mr. CULLOM. The regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] can not be considered at the present time.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is now completed.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution introduced by me on Thursday last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana, which was laid on the table subject to his call. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 53) defining the policy of the United States relative to the Philippine Islands, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I address the Senate at this time because Senators and Members of the House on both sides have asked that I give to Congress and the country my observations in the Philippines and the far East, and the conclusions which those observations compel; and because of hurtful resolutions introduced and utterances made in the Senate, every word of which will cost and is costing the lives of American soldiers.

Mr. President, the times call for candor. The Philippines are ours forever, "territory belonging to the United States," as the Constitution calls them. And just beyond the Philippines are China's illimitable markets. We will not retreat from either. We will not repudiate our duty in the archipelago. We will not abandon our opportunity in the Orient. We will not renounce our part in the mission of our race, trustee, under God, of the civilization of the world. And we will move forward to our work, not howling out regrets like slaves whipped to their burdens, but with gratitude for a task worthy of our strength, and thanksgiving to Almighty God that He has marked us as His chosen people, henceforth to lead in the regeneration of the world.

PHILIPPINES COMMAND THE PACIFIC.

This island empire is the last land left in all the oceans. If it should prove a mistake to abandon it, the blunder once made would be irretrievable. If it proves a mistake to hold it, the error can be corrected when we will. Every other progressive nation stands ready to relieve us.

But to hold it will be no mistake. Our largest trade henceforth must be with Asia. The Pacific is our ocean. More and more Europe will manufacture the most it needs, secure from its colonies the most it consumes. Where shall we turn for consumers of our surplus? Geography answers the question. China is our natural customer. She is nearer to us than to England, Germany, or Russia, the commercial powers of the present and the future. They have moved nearer to China by securing permanent bases on her borders. The Philippines give us a base at the door of all the East.

Lines of navigation from our ports to the Orient and Australia; from the Isthmian Canal to Asia; from all Oriental ports to Australia, converge at and separate from the Philippines. They are a self-supporting, dividend-paying fleet, permanently anchored at a spot selected by the strategy of Providence, commanding the Pacific. And the Pacific is the ocean of the commerce of the future. Most future wars will be conflicts for commerce. The power that rules the Pacific, therefore, is the power that rules the world. And, with the Philippines, that power is and will forever be the American Republic.

VALUE OF CHINA'S TRADE.

China's trade is the mightiest commercial fact in our future. Her foreign commerce was $285,738,300 in 1897, of which we, her neighbor, had less than 9 per cent, of which only a little more than half was merchandise sold to China by us. We ought to have 50 per cent, and we will. And China's foreign commerce is only beginning. Her resources, her possibilities, her wants, all are undeveloped. She has only 340 miles of railway. I have seen trains loaded with natives and all the activities of modern life already appearing along the line. But she needs, and in fifty years will have, 20,000 miles of railway.

Who can estimate her commerce, then? That statesman commits a crime against American trade—against the American grower of cotton and wheat and tobacco, the American manufacturer of machinery and clothing—who fails to put America where she may command that trade. Germany's Chinese trade is increasing like magic. She has established ship lines and secured a tangible foothold on China's very soil. Russia's Chinese trade is growing beyond belief. She is spending the revenues of the Empire to finish her railroad into Peking itself, and she is in physical possession of the imperial province of Manchuria. Japan's Chinese trade is multiplying in volume and value. She is bending her energy to her merchant marine, and is located along China's very coast; but Manila is nearer China than Yokohama is. The Philippines command the commercial situation of the entire East. Can America best trade with China from San Francisco or New York? From San Francisco, of course. But if San Francisco were closer to China than New York is to Pittsburg, what then? And Manila is nearer Hongkong than Habana is to Washington. And yet American statesmen plan to surrender this commercial throne of the Orient where Providence and our soldiers' lives have placed us. When history comes to write the story of that suggested treason to American supremacy and therefore to the spread of American civilization, let her in mercy write that those who so proposed were merely blind and nothing more.

RESOURCES AND IMMENSE SIZE OF THE ISLANDS.

But if they did not command China, India, the Orient, the whole Pacific for purposes of offense, defense, and trade, the Philippines are so valuable in themselves that we should hold them. I have cruised more than 2,000 miles through the archipelago, every moment a surprise at its loveliness and wealth. I have ridden hundreds of miles on the islands, every foot of the way a revelation of vegetable and mineral riches.

No land in America surpasses in fertility the plains and valleys of Luzon. Rice and coffee, sugar and coconuts, hemp and tobacco, and many products of the temperate as well as the tropic zone grow in various sections of the archipelago. I have seen hundreds of bushels of Indian corn lying in a road fringed with banana trees. The forests of Negros, Mindanao, Mindora, Paluan, and parts of Luzon are invaluable and intact. The wood of the Philippines can supply the furniture of the world for a century to come. At Cebu the best informed man in the island told me that 40 miles of Cebu's mountain chain are practically mountains of coal. Pablo Majia, one of the most reliable men on the islands, confirmed the statement. Some declare that the coal is only lignite; but ship captains who have used it told me that it is better steamer fuel than the best coal of Japan.

I have a nugget of pure gold picked up in its present form on the banks of a Philippine creek. I have gold dust washed out by crude processes of careless natives from the sands of a Philippine stream. Both indicate great deposits at the source from which they come. In one of the islands great deposits of copper exist untouched. The mineral wealth of this empire of the ocean will one day surprise the world. I base this statement partly on personal observation, but chiefly on the testimony of foreign merchants in the Philippines, who have practically investigated the subject, and upon the unanimous opinion of natives and priests. And the mineral wealth is but a small fraction of the agricultural wealth of these islands.

And the wood, hemp, copra, and other products of the Philippines supply what we need and can not ourselves produce. And the markets they will themselves afford will be immense. Spain's export and import trade, with the islands undeveloped, was $11,534,731 annually. Our trade with the islands developed will be $125,000,000 annually, for who believes that we can not do ten times as well as Spain? Consider their imperial dimensions. Luzon is larger and richer than New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, or Ohio. Mindanao is larger and richer than all New England, exclusive of Maine. Manila, as a port of call and exchange, will, in the time of men now living, far surpass Liverpool. Behold the exhaustless markets they command. It is as if a half dozen of our States were set down between Oceania and the Orient, and those States themselves undeveloped and unspoiled of their primitive wealth and resources.

Nothing is so natural as trade with one's neighbors. The Philippines make us the nearest neighbors of all the East. Nothing is more natural than to trade with those you know. This is the philosophy of all advertising. The Philippines bring us permanently face to face with the most sought-for customers of the world. National prestige, national propinquity, these and commercial activity are the elements of commercial success. The Philippines give the first; the character of the American people supply the last. It is a providential conjunction of all the elements of trade, of duty, and of power. If we are willing to go to war rather than let England have a few feet of frozen Alaska, which affords no market and commands none, what should we not do rather than let England, Germany, Russia, or Japan have all the Philippines? And no man on the spot can fail to see that this would be their fate if we retired.

PHILIPPINE CLIMATE.

The climate is the best tropic climate in the world. This is the belief of those who have lived in many tropic countries, with scores of whom I have talked on this point. My own experience with tropical conditions has not been exhaustive; yet, speaking from that experience, I testify that the climate of Iloilo, Sulu, Cebu, and even of Manila, greatly surpasses that of Hongkong. And yet on the bare and burning rock of Hongkong our constructing race has builded one of the noblest cities of all the world, and made the harbor it commands the focus of the commerce of the East. And the glory of that achievement illumines with a rarer splendor than that of Waterloo the flag that floats above it, for from Hongkong's heights civilization is irradiating all the Orient. If this be imperialism, its final end will be the empire of the Son of Man.

Yet fifty years ago this English outpost of empire was a smooth and treeless mountain, blazing like a ball of fire beneath the tropic suns. The Philippines are beautiful and rich, with the healing seas pouring round and through them and fanned by a thousand winds. Even in the hottest season, under severest conditions, I found the weather tolerable and often delightful; and in Luzon, Panay, Cebu, Negros, and Sulu I have been in the sun and rain without protection from either for hours at a time, traveling from place to place on horseback, on foot, or in a boat, rising at dawn, retiring at midnight, week after week, without injury to health.

General MacArthur, commanding a force which had been fighting continuously for three months and which was under fire practically every hour, was in excellent health every time I saw him at San Fernando, our extreme front. General Lawton, that perfect soldier, whom I have seen ride, order, plan, and execute all day, and then ride, order, plan, and execute all night, until the Tagals named him "the soldier of the night," told me that his health was perfect. General Otis, that devoted servant of the Republic, who toils ceaselessly, does not fall ill, nor grow weary, nor complain. I could give the names of scores of our officers and describe their feats of endurance witnessed by me that would have taxed their strength even in America. Yet they do not succumb. I have seen correspondents exert themselves in all kinds of weather without food or sleep in a way that would prostrate them in the hottest days of our summer in Chicago or New York. Major Hoyt, chief medical officer with MacArthur, told me that San Fernando is as healthy as the average American town. The European business men of Cebu, Iloilo, and Manila work as hard and as many hours a day as those of New York, and a finer body of physical manhood can not be gathered at random in America. This proves that this garden of the seas is not the sweltering, steaming, miasmatic swamp it has been described.

CHARACTER OF THE PEOPLE—AGUINALDO.

It will be hard for Americans who have not studied them to understand the people. They are a barbarous race, modified by three centuries of contact with a decadent race. The Filipino is the South Sea Malay, put through a process of three hundred years of superstition in religion, dishonesty in dealing, disorder in habits of industry, and cruelty, caprice, and corruption in government. It is barely possible that 1,000 men in all the archipelago are capable of self-government in the Anglo-Saxon sense.

My own belief is that there are not 100 men among them who comprehend what Anglo-Saxon self-government even means, and there are over 5,000,000 people to be governed. I know many clever and highly educated men among them, but there are only three commanding intellects and characters—Arellano, Mabini, and Aguinaldo. Arellano, the chief justice of our supreme court, is a profound lawyer and a brave and incorruptible man. Mabini, who, before his capture, was the literary and diplomatic associate of Aguinaldo, is the highest type of subtlety and the most constructive mind that race has yet produced. Aguinaldo is a clever, popular leader, able, brave, resourceful, cunning, ambitious, unscrupulous, and masterful. He is full of decision, initiative, and authority, and had the confidence of the masses. He is a natural dictator. His ideas of government are absolute orders, implicit obedience, or immediate death. He understands the character of his countrymen. He is a Malay Sylla; not a Filipino Washington.

These conclusions were forced upon me by observing the people in all walks of life in the different islands, and by conversations with foreign merchants, priests, mestizos, pure Filipinos, and every variety of mind, character, and opinion from San Fernando, in Luzon, on down through the entire archipelago to the interior of Sulu. These conversations were had informally at dinner tables, on journeys, and the like, and always under conditions favorable to entire frankness and unreserve. Their chief value is that they are the real opinions of their authors and not prepared and guarded statements. I will read to the Senate salient points from a few of my notes of these conversations, reserving the names of the persons interviewed, except that of Pablo Majia, of Cebu, who was assassinated a week after I met him, and whose fate I will not risk bringing down on others. Their names and residences are here in this book, and will be gladly given to any Senator or to the Senate in executive session. The conversations themselves, of course, are many of them quite extended. I give here only the brief extracts, which may be helpful to a correct understanding of the subject immediately in hand.

One of the principal merchants of the Philippines and the far East said, among many other things:

The whole country is incalculably rich. With only ordinary good government commerce would be immense. Spanish rule was corrupt, but commerce accustomed itself to the conditions and flourished in spite of them. So rich is the country that commerce will survive any situation, however bad, if it is only fixed and certain. The people are incapable of self-government. The few exceptions are no examples of the masses. For years to come a very strong government will be necessary. The climate is very good. I have lived here eighteen years, and my health was never better.

One of the principal business men of the Philippines and the far East said:

I have no fault to find with the climate. My health is very fine. Business here, large as it is, is only a hint of what will be under a good government. I think it folly to talk of giving the natives any part in the government. They are incapable. Of course there are, possibly, half a dozen who might be capable, but I doubt the result of such an experiment, even with the best. Anything but a strong government at first will result in disaster. Do not put courts into their hands at all, except the minor and village courts, of course. You might give them municipal self-government in the smaller municipalities, but even then only under careful supervision.

The most eminent educator in the Philippines, of very wide information about the people and the country, said:

It is a marvelous country. The climate is the ideal tropical climate of the world. Also, it presents every variety of climate. Only a moderate distance from Manila, in the province of Benguet, there are oaks, pines, frost, and you must use blankets at night. It is the richest and most variegated portion of the earth's surface. My health has always been good. You must introduce a strong, decisive, and pure government. The natives might possibly be permitted to take a practical part in municipal affairs.

Self-government is out of the question. I fear the insurrection will last for months. The natives are like buffalo bulls—they get mad and then want to fight, no matter whether right or wrong. You can not successfully deal with them by gentle means; they absolutely misunderstand such treatment. While in arms they must be fought, fought ceaselessly and remorselessly. Otherwise they will keep it up forever.

The most eminent scientist of the far East, better informed on the Philippines and their people and more experienced in the whole situation than any man now living, said:

The climate is the best tropical climate in the world. My health is excellent and has been for years. Nearly everything can be raised in the islands. Also nearly any climate can be had in the various altitudes practically accessible. It will take a long time to prepare the people for self-government. Certainly they are not so now. I think everything must for years be firmly controlled by the Americans.

A gentleman connected with the railroad service and thoroughly acquainted with the people said:

The climate of these islands is perfect for the Tropics. I have been here altogether for six years and never enjoyed better health. I think these fellows will keep on fighting for months. They are utterly incapable of self-government as Americans or English understand it. They might, under very careful and firm direction, be allowed to take a little part in municipal government, but not much even there. If they were given self-government, business would almost disappear, until some European power took the matter in hand.

One of the large planters and business men of the interior of Luzon, a pure Filipino, with intimate relations with the insurgents:

It is hard to say how long the contest will last. The very common people care little about the matter, but have been told and believe many bad things about the Americans. What Filipinos want is to govern themselves. No, of course, they do not know anything about government except that Spain gave them, which was most corrupt. If you gave those islands a government where justice would be administered freely and without price, property protected, and free speech secured, you ask me if the common people would be satisfied. I do not know.

The common people do not know what they want. Are they capable of self-government—of voting intelligently? What difference does that make? They would vote just exactly as the better classes say. I employ several hundred men. Well, I expect and would see to it that they have the same opinions I have. Humph! It would be impossible otherwise. What the Filipino leaders talk about and insist on is a guaranty. By this they mean Filipinos to have exclusive government of the islands, the United States to keep a fleet here to protect that government and the islands generally in every possible situation, and this agreement witnessed by a third nation, strong enough to compel the United States to carry out its contract. The people are not capable of self-government, but the leaders are, or would be after some practice; so it is just the same thing.

A pure Filipino, a physician, a man of wealth, in the interior of Luzon—one of the most intelligent men of the many I met and talked to:

It is hard to say how long this struggle will continue. The leaders say they want independence; the common people probably want socialism. To be definite and particular, they probably do not know what they want. No, they are not capable of self-government. If you give them pure government, free speech, and all that, they would not understand and appreciate it at first; would not believe it, as it were.

But when, after awhile, three or four years, say, they come to understand your good intentions and actually experience good government, there will be no trouble. Oh, yes; the islands are marvelously rich. After good government is once in operation, they will pay their way many times over. My people are not a bad people; they don't understand; they are children yet.

The principal British merchant of Iloilo said:

The climate is simply splendid, even here on the sea. A very short distance inland you must have fire every night. I have been here more than twenty years, and my health is and always has been most excellent. The only time I ever felt heat badly was in New York last September. It goes without saying that the country is enormously rich. Its resources have not yet even begun to be developed. Vast as commerce is or was, it is only a suggestion to what may be. The natives are a kind, affectionate people when properly treated. They are suspicious, though, and once aroused, very obstinate. Surely they are capable of self-government in municipal matters. Further than that I think it not safe to go at present. The common people probably do not understand the meaning of self-government as we do.

There is no doubt that they would be completely dominated by their leaders. I should think it a very risky business to put the courts in the hands of the natives, even if you allowed them a large measure of self-government otherwise. You see; they do not understand the just and pure administration of law through courts. How should they? The whole secret of your success will be to adopt some definite plan, stick to it, govern justly and firmly, be patient, do not expect everything in a day, and very gradually and wisely introduce them into the government. But all will fail if you send any but pure and incorruptible men here.

Another British merchant of Iloilo said:

My health was never better. The weather here is a hundred times more agreeable than some of the summer weather in Chicago. Of course the natives are not capable of self-government. You must establish a strong, honest, firm rule throughout the islands—the same laws, rights, and forms everywhere. Don't indulge in any nonsense about self-government. It is out of the question, at present at least. Don't moralize and theorize. Do. Fix your plan. Let all know definitely just what it is, and then execute it firmly, vigorously. The natives understand strength and justice or injustice. That is as far as they have gotten. Don't palaver with them. Treating with them they construe as fear. Don't be academic.

A highly educated and bright Spanish mestizo, claiming to be pure Filipino, employed in Iloilo, said:

No one can tell when the fighting will cease. It all depends upon what Aguinaldo says. The common people have absolute faith in him. His order among those now in rebellion in this island would be promptly obeyed. The common people say they are fighting for their independence. They mean by this the right to manage their own government; make and execute their own laws. Their ideas of a proper relation between the Philippine Islands and people of the United States is that of a protectorate. The leaders absolutely control the people. A man of property expects his working people to have the same opinion as he has. I do myself.

It is, perhaps, true that the masses do not understand what self-government means. I think that there are enough capable and educated men among our people to control government, but I do not believe that the great mass of the people are at all fitted for self-government now and will not be for a long time. You should have uniform laws over the entire archipelago. If you have one thing at one place and another at another place, each will think and say that the other is better treated, and you will have constant and serious disturbance. Already the people of this island are very angry because Negroes are given a United States constitution. That is a profound mistake. Don't experiment. Select your plan and execute it. English ought to be made the one language of the island.

A rich planter of Panay, pure Filipino, but moderate in views, said:

The common people have no opinions and are not capable of voting. If the Filipinos established a government, of course the property and educated class would, beyond doubt, run such government. Not more than 25 per cent of the people are fitted to take part in the selection of public officers. The people are at present incapable of self-government, though they might be intrusted with purely municipal affairs. Establish precisely the same laws through the archipelago. English should be universally taught. The common people know and care nothing about self-government or any other government. They are principally interested in simply living. Self-government can only mean government by the upper classes.

A prominent but very conservative business man of Panay:

You may be a long time subduing this insurrection. The people are not yet capable of self-government in the archipelago. It is well, though, to trust them with municipal administration, provided everything is under your final supervision. The proposition to have the same commercial laws everywhere is too plain for argument. The climate is not bad at all. You see that for yourself. It is very cool here, you see, this evening. My own health has been excellent, and is now. There is very little sickness among the English here.

A leading mestizo of Negros:

The island of Negros is far ahead of any other island in the culture of its people. Our chief desire now is to get utterly away from Spanish customs, laws, and traditions. I think we are quite capable of self-government under American protection. If the Philippine Islands are made into a Federal system we would expect to be one of the States. Certainly we can manage the local affairs of the island. Exclusive of the savages of the mountains, I should say that 4 or 5 per cent of the people are now capable of intelligent voting.

I think the voting should be by those who own property, can read and write, or are established householders and heads of families, with definite residences. I would find out who should vote by having a committee in each town make out a list and then notify the ones chosen. Certainly I would expect the common people to follow the advice of the leaders and vote for whom the leaders said. I should think my own employees would take my view of a situation. If you give us a government where justice is administered without corruption or delay, property protected without a fee, free speech insured, commercial language provided, the people will be satisfied.

Spain did none of this, but the reverse. That is, and was, our complaint. English should be immediately made the language of the whole archipelago. I do not think the same political laws should prevail throughout the islands. One place should have laws adapted to it; another, laws adapted to it. The reason for this is that the people of the various islands are of different degrees of culture. Of course, though, I think the whole archipelago a commercial unit.

Pure Filipino and large planter of Negros:

I have working for me about 400 men. They are good, average examples of the common people of the island. I should say that not over 3 or 4 per cent of them are capable of self-government or in any true sense understand the term. If the ballot were given them, or even if it were restricted to those 3 or 4 per cent, I should expect them to vote as the leaders might indicate. I think the English language should be immediately adopted throughout the entire archipelago. It would simplify matters incalculably. No, I do not believe the same laws should prevail everywhere. We of Negros are more cultivated than in Panay. We deserve better laws.

Very large planter and influential man of Negros, claiming to be pure Filipino, but with some Chinese blood:

The climate is most excellent. The wealth of these islands is beyond imagination. We have only begun to develop our resources. For example, we have not touched our minerals, practically. Lands you see yonder are really better for agricultural purposes than this low, flat coast land. No; it is not yet occupied, and the title to it is still in the government.

I have several American plows. They do good work. We do not use more because they are not brought to us. The native plow has served our purpose and our inertia makes it inconvenient to change, if effort is necessary. Yes; enterprising agency would sell many plows. I have several carriages made in America. I have from 1,000 to 1,500 men working for me. Of these practically all are capable of self-government. Would they vote as I wished? Most assuredly they would. By all means make English the language of these islands as speedily as possible. It will increase commerce and get us farther away from the old and hated régime.

I regard these islands as a commercial unit, and think uniform laws should prevail throughout the archipelago. Your young men could come here and buy land and soon get enormously rich. You need not fear that we leaders would be able to control elections. The government itself would nominate all the officers or candidates; so you see the people would have to vote for good men. What would I do if any man spoke against or criticised the government? Why, anyone rising against the government would be tried and shot if condemned.

Prominent Filipino of Cebu:

The island of Cebu can yield greatly more than it has. The people are disturbed by what they have been through and what they fear. Very few are capable of self-government now. My brother employs a large number of men. If given the ballot, they would most certainly vote as he said. I am sure the better classes would control the voting of the poorer classes. We should expect to hold positions under any government you establish.

A foreign planter of Panay, then in Cebu:

No, the people are not capable of self-government. You had better beware of giving them too much than too little. If you give them more than in their hearts they expect, you lay the foundation of trouble. No matter what plan you adopt, it all depends on the men you send here to execute it. If they are made political billets, you are irretrievably lost. Your governor-general must be absolutely honest, brave, tactful, broad-minded, and able. Pay him well. He will earn it, if he ought to have the place at all. The strictest supervision should be exercised by him. An impure man could do more damage and more disgrace to the name of America than a hundred men could remedy. Govern firmly and justly and nonpolitically.

Pablo Majia, pure Filipino, rich, able, honest, and moderate. He was stabbed to death in Cebu, and this is why I withhold the names of the others:

I do not think anyone could ask for a better climate than this. It is much better than Hongkong. The resources of this island have not begun to be developed. Our coal is very good, much better than Japan coal. There is copper, too, on this island, not yet worked. I am sorry to say that very few of our population are capable of self-government.

Of course the wealthy and educated classes are entirely competent to run the government. I do not expect nor desire any government except one founded on and directed by America. Oh, yes; to such extent as the ballot may be given, there is no doubt that we of the upper class can control. I employ 100 men now—in good times more. All these would vote as I say.

An educator of Cebu, who has lived among the Filipinos for twenty-five years, and one of the ablest men I ever met:

For general health and for all human conditions I consider this climate unequalled in the world. When I left Europe twenty-five years ago and came here my health was wretched. Here I am never ill. The resources of these islands are simply marvelous. Think of the agricultural richness of Negros! Think of the mineral wealth of Cebu! For 40 miles this chain of mountains back of us is one continuous coal mine. The coal is excellent. It is far better than the Japan coal. And there are very rich copper deposits over yonder; nobody ever worked them yet. There is gold here, too.

Here, I will make you a present of this gold dust; it was scooped up from one of our streams here. It proves the existence of very heavy deposits at the point from which these fragments were washed down. In another island there are very rich gold deposits. Let me present you with this nugget. It was picked up just as you see it. I have seen nuggets from there as large as your thumb—pure, solid gold. Why are they not worked? Oh, we have been so far out of the world, you know, the world has forgotten us. And, then, the strange apathy of the Spanish Government and people. But that is all good luck for you. These people are not capable of self-government. That ought to be apparent to any thoughtful person. They are strangely childish. They do not themselves understand clearly what they are fighting for. Independence to the common people means anarchy, or, rather, socialism.

To the upper classes it means rule and dominion. If the ballot were placed in the hands of the people, they would vote as their leaders said. It would be well to make English the language of all the islands—but, dear me, what a fearful time you will have teaching it. Why, my dear friend, we have been teaching them Spanish for three hundred years—working hard, too—and yet they speak it very badly even now. They are not bright; really, they are stupid. They resemble very much the caribou. They learn with great difficulty. Come into the islands with practical common sense, not scholastically, theoretically, or experimentally. The islands can be made a great blessing to you, and you to them, and they also can be made a great curse.

A gentleman living in Sulu and who has spent his entire life in various tropical countries said:

The resources of these islands are not even guessed. This land we stand on grows cocoa, sugar, rice, coffee, and hemp, and all of the finest quality. As to the health, the conditions are perfect. I am thoroughly acquainted with Asiatic and Pacific Tropics, and I consider this climate the ideal climate of them all. I hope you are not contemplating such a thing as self-government for the archipelago. It would be a hideous mistake. They are utterly incapable of participating in government.

May be in some places municipal government might, to a limited extent, be put in the hands of the more competent natives, but even then, I fear, it would work badly. But government of the archipelago by natives would mean continuous civil war. I want you people to succeed, but you will ignominiously and frightfully fail if you put up a weak or a half-hearted government here. I have spent my life here, in Borneo, Java, Straits Settlements, and other such places, and I know this people thoroughly. You have a glorious opportunity here and you must not ruin it.

I will close these few extracts, which are a fair sample of a great number of others, all of which I am willing to submit to the Senate at any time, by reading a few suggestions made to me by the first statesman of the far East, who has had practical experience with similar problems. In the course of a long interview he said:

You must establish government over the islands, because it is incalculably to your interest in the future, and because, if you do not, another power will undoubtedly take them, involving the world in a war for which you will be responsible.

As to the form of government, you should have a governor-general of great ability, firmness, and purity; under him sub-officers of districts, and under them still lower officials for the municipalities, all appointed by their superiors and not chosen by the people. You should employ the ablest natives in the Government service in some way so as to enlist them on your side. The courts are the most important consideration of all. Don't put the natives in charge of them whatever else you do. In the armed forces, don't give any native superior positions for a long time. Don't do too much for them in the beginning. Do it gradually, as the years go by. I think your course is clear. Don't treat with them until you defeat them. You must do that. You can not treat and fight.

Make English the language of the courts, schools, and everything else. Let me impress on you the necessity of conferring your benefits on them quite gradually. If you give them too much they can not appreciate nor understand nor rightly use it, and it will thus be thrown away; but if you give them the blessing of free institutions gradually, you furnish a source of constant gratitude. In the other way you exhaust yourself at the beginning, and besides fail in your good intentions.

WE WILL HOLD IT FAST, AND HOLD IT FOREVER.

Here, then, Senators, is the situation. Two years ago there was no land in all the world which we could occupy for any purpose. Our commerce was daily turning toward the Orient, and geography and trade developments made necessary our commercial empire over the Pacific. And in that ocean we had no commercial, naval, or military base. To-day we have one of the three great ocean possessions of the globe, located at the most commanding commercial, naval, and military points in the eastern seas, within hail of India, shoulder to shoulder with China, richer in its own resources than any equal body of land on the entire globe, and peopled by a race which civilization demands shall be improved. Shall we abandon it? That man little knows the common people of the Republic, little understands the instincts of our race, who thinks we will not hold it fast and hold it forever, administering just government by simplest methods. We may trick up devices to shift our burden and lessen our opportunity; they will avail us nothing but delay. We may tangle conditions by applying academic arrangements of self-government to a crude situation; their failure will drive us to our duty in the end.

MILITARY SITUATION—OTIS DEFENDED.

The military situation, past, present, and prospective, is no reason for abandonment. Our campaign has been as perfect as possible with the force at hand. We have been delayed, first, by a failure to comprehend the immensity of our acquisition; and, second, by insufficient force; and, third, by our efforts for peace. In February, after the treaty of peace, General Otis had only 3,723 officers and men whom he had a legal right to order into battle. The terms of enlistment of the rest of his troops had expired, and they fought voluntarily and not on legal military compulsion. It was one of the noblest examples of patriotic devotion to duty in the history of the world.

Those who complain do so in ignorance of the real situation. We attempted a great task with insufficient means; we became impatient that it was not finished before it could fairly be commenced; and I pray we may not add that other element of disaster, pausing in the work before it is thoroughly and forever done. That is the gravest mistake we could possibly make, and that is the only danger before us. Our Indian wars would have been shortened, the lives of soldiers and settlers saved, and the Indians themselves benefited had we made continuous and decisive war; and any other kind of war is criminal because ineffective. We acted toward the Indians as though we feared them, loved them, hated them—a mingling of foolish sentiment, inaccurate thought, —a paralytic purpose. Let us now be instructed by our own experience.

This, too, has been Spain's course in the Philippines. I have studied Spain's painful military history in these islands. Never sufficient troops; never vigorous action, pushed to conclusive results and a permanent peace; always treating with the rebels while they fought them; always cruel and corrupt when a spurious peace was arranged. This has been Spain's way for three hundred years, until insurrection has become a Filipino habit. Never since Magellan landed did Spain put enough troops in the islands for complete and final action in war; never did she intelligently, justly, firmly, administer government in peace.

At the outbreak of the last insurrection, in August, 1896, Spain had only 1,500 Spanish soldiers in all the Philippines, and 700 of these were in Manila. In November of that year she had only 10,000 men. The generals in command of these were criticised and assailed in Spain. It is characteristic of Spain that the people at home do not support, but criticise their generals in the field. The Spanish method has always been a mixed policy of peace and war, a contradiction of terms, an impossible combination, rendering war ineffective and peace impossible. This was Compo's plan. It was Blanco's plan. Those who would make it our plan will inherit Blanco's fate and failure.

TRUE MILITARY POLICY.

Mr. President, that must not be our plan. This war is like all other wars. It needs to be finished before it is stopped. I am prepared to vote either to make our work thorough or even now to abandon it. A lasting peace can be secured only by overwhelming forces in ceaseless action until universal and absolutely final defeat is inflicted on the enemy. To halt before every armed force, every guerrilla band, opposing us is dispersed or exterminated will prolong hostilities and leave alive the seeds of perpetual insurrection.

Even then we should not treat. To treat at all is to admit that we are wrong. And any quiet so secured will be delusive and fleeting. And a false peace will betray us; a sham truce will curse us. It is not to serve the purposes of the hour, it is not to save a present situation, that peace should be established. It is for the tranquillity of the archipelago forever. It is for an orderly government for the Filipinos for all the future. It is to give this problem to posterity solved and settled; not vexed and involved. It is to establish the supremacy of the American Republic over the Pacific and throughout the East till the end of time.

It has been charged that our conduct of the war has been cruel. Senators, it has been the reverse. I have been in our hospitals and seen the Filipino wounded as carefully, tenderly cared for as our own. Within our lines they may plow and sow and reap and go about the affairs of peace with absolute liberty. And yet all this kindness was misunderstood, or rather not understood. Senators must remember that we are not dealing with Americans or Europeans. We are dealing with Orientals. We are dealing with Orientals who are Malays. We are dealing with Malays instructed in Spanish methods. They mistake kindness for weakness, forbearance for fear. It could not be otherwise unless you could erase hundreds of years of savagery, other hundreds of years of orientalism, and still other hundreds of years of Spanish character and custom.

OUR EFFORTS TO SECURE PEACE.

Our mistake has not been cruelty; it has been kindness. It has been the application to Spanish Malays of methods appropriate to New England. Every device of mercy, every method of conciliation, has been employed by the peace-loving President of the American Republic, to the amazement of nations experienced in oriental revolt. Before the outbreak our general in command appointed a commission to make some arrangement with the natives mutually agreeable. I know the members of the commission well—General Hughes, Colonel Crowder, and General Smith—moderate, kindly, tactful men of the world; an ideal body for such negotiation. It was treated with contempt.

We smiled at intolerable insult and insolence until the lips of every native in Manila were curling in ridicule for the cowardly Americans. We refrained from all violence until their armed bravos crossed the lines in violation of agreement. Then our sentry shot the offender, and he should have been court-martialed had he failed to shoot. That shot was the most fortunate of the war. For there is every reason to believe that Aguinaldo had planned the attack upon us for some nights later. Our sentry's shot brought this attack prematurely on. He arranged for an uprising in Manila to massacre all Americans, the plans for which, in a responsible officer's handwriting, are in our possession. This shot and its results made that awful scheme impossible. We did not strike till they attacked us in force, without provocation. This left us no alternative but war or evacuation.

WORK OF THE COMMISSION.

The patience of our peace-loving President was not even then exhausted. A civil commission was sent to Manila, composed of the president of one of our great universities, a distinguished diplomat and an eminent college professor who had special knowledge of the country and people and also General Otis and Admiral Dewey. These men exhausted the expedients of peace, and always were met with the Malay's ready evasion, the Spaniard's habitual delay. I am personal witness that no effort was neglected by our commission to assure the Filipino people of our good intentions and beneficent purposes. The commission entertained the mestizos of Manila in a way that would have honored the Senate of the United States; the brown faces of the common people sneered. The commission treated natives, accustomed to blows, with kindest consideration; the agents of Aguinaldo told tales of our pusillanimity to the ignorant rural masses. This remarkable man sent so-called commissions, ostensibly to treat, but really to play with ours. His commissions were composed of generals in uniform. The populace gaped in open admiration when they appeared in Manila. Our representatives of peace talked to them, argued with them, entertained them; the people were impressed with their importance. President Schurman even rode with them through the city. The masses were confirmed in their reverence for their brothers who were thus honored and distinguished. Then the bespangled representatives of the Malay dictator return to their lord, and the sole effect of these pacific efforts was to make 250,000 natives in Manila think that the only way to win the respect of the American Republic is to fight it.

No, Senators, the friendly methods of peace have been thoroughly tried only to make peace more difficult. The Oriental does not understand our attempt to conciliate. Every effort of our commission which did its work at Manila so earnestly, so honestly, so thoroughly, and which, with Americans or Europeans, would have so brilliantly succeeded, only delayed the peace it attempted to hasten. There is not now and never was any possible course but ceaseless operations in the field and loyal support of the war at home.

The news that 60,000 American soldiers have crossed the Pacific; that, if necessary, the American Congress will make it 100,000 or 200,000 men; that, at any cost, we will establish peace and govern the islands, will do more to end the war than the soldiers themselves. But the report that we even discuss the withdrawal of a single soldier at the present time and that we even debate the possibility of not administering government throughout the archipelago ourselves will be misunderstood and misrepresented and will blow into a flame once more the fires our soldiers' blood has almost quenched.

"THE BLOOD OF OUR SOLDIERS."

Mr. President, reluctantly and only from a sense of duty am I forced to say that American opposition to the war has been the chief factor in prolonging it. Had Aguinaldo not understood that in America, even in the American Congress, even here in the Senate, he and his cause were supported; had he not known that it was proclaimed on the stump and in the press of a faction in the United States that every shot his misguided followers fired into the breasts of American soldiers was like the volleys fired by Washington's men against the soldiers of King George his insurrection would have dissolved before it entirely crystallized.

The utterances of American opponents of the war are read to the ignorant soldiers of Aguinaldo and repeated in exaggerated form among the common people. Attempts have been made by wretches claiming American citizenship to ship arms and ammunition from Asiatic ports to the Filipinos, and these acts of infamy were coupled by the Malays with American assaults on our Government at home. The Filipinos do not understand free speech, and therefore our tolerance of American assaults on the American President and the American Government means to them that our President is in the minority or he would not permit what appears to them such treasonable criticism. It is believed and stated in Luzon, Panay, and Cebu that the Filipinos have only to fight, harass, retreat, break up into small parties, if necessary, as they are doing now, but by any means hold out until the next Presidential election, and our forces will be withdrawn.

All this has aided the enemy more than climate, arms, and battle. Senators, I have heard these reports myself; I have talked with the people; I have seen our mangled boys in the hospital and field; I have stood on the firing line and beheld our dead soldiers, their faces turned to the pitiless southern sky, and in sorrow rather than anger I say to those whose voices in America have cheered those misguided natives on to shoot our soldiers down, that the blood of those dead and wounded boys of ours is on their hands, and the flood of all the years can never wash that stain away. In sorrow rather than anger I say these words, for I earnestly believe that our brothers knew not what they did.

THE FILIPINOS ARE CHILDREN, UTTERLY INCAPABLE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT.

But, Senators, it would be better to abandon this combined garden and Gibraltar of the Pacific, and count our blood and treasure already spent a profitable loss, than to apply any academic arrangement of self-government to these children. They are not capable of self-government. How could they be? They are not of a self-governing race. They are Orientals, Malays, instructed by Spaniards in the latter's worst estate.

They know nothing of practical government except as they have witnessed the weak, corrupt, cruel, and capricious rule of Spain. What magic will anyone employ to dissolve in their minds and characters those impressions of governors and governed which three centuries of misrule has created? What alchemy will change the oriental quality of their blood and set the self-governing currents of the American pouring through their Malay veins? How shall they, in the twinkling of an eye, be exalted to the heights of self-governing peoples which required a thousand years for us to reach, Anglo-Saxon though we are?

Let men beware how they employ the term "self-government." It is a sacred term. It is the watchword at the door of the inner temple of liberty, for liberty does not always mean self-government. Self-government is a method of liberty—the highest, simplest, best—and it is acquired only after centuries of study and struggle and experiment and instruction and all the elements of the progress of man. Self-government is no base and common thing, to be bestowed on the merely audacious. It is the degree which crowns the graduate of liberty, not the name of liberty's infant class, who have not yet mastered the alphabet of freedom. Savage blood, oriental blood, Malay blood, Spanish example—are these the elements of self-government?

We must act on the situation as it exists, not as we would wish it. I have talked with hundreds of these people, getting their views as to the practical workings of self-government. The great majority simply do not understand any participation in any government whatever. The most enlightened among them declare that self-government will succeed because the employers of labor will compel their employees to vote as their employer wills and that this will insure intelligent voting. I was assured that we could depend upon good men always being in office because the officials who constitute the government will nominate their successors, choose those among the people who will do the voting, and determine how and where elections will be held.

The most ardent advocate of self-government that I met was anxious that I should know that such a government would be tranquil because, as he said, if anyone criticised it, the government would shoot the offender. A few of them have a sort of verbal understanding of the democratic theory, but the above are the examples of the ideas of the practical workings of self-government entertained by the aristocracy, the rich planters and traders, and heavy employers of labor, the men who would run the government.

PEOPLE INDOLENT—NO COMPETITION WITH OUR LABOR.

Example for decades will be necessary to instruct them in American ideas and methods of administration. Example, example; always example—this alone will teach them. As a race, their general ability is not excellent. Educators, both men and women, to whom I have talked in Cebu and Luzon, were unanimous in the opinion that in all solid and useful education they are, as a people, dull and stupid. In showy things, like carving and painting or embroidery or music, they have apparent aptitude, but even this is superficial and never thorough. They have facility of speech, too.

The three best educators on the island at different times made to me the same comparison, that the common people in their stupidity are like their caribou bulls. They are not even good agriculturists. Their waste of cane is inexcusable. Their destruction of hemp fiber is childish. They are incurably indolent. They have no continuity or thoroughness of industry. They will quit work without notice and amuse themselves until the money they have earned is spent. They are like children playing at men's work.

No one need fear their competition with our labor. No reward could beguile, no force compel, these children of indolence to leave their trifling lives for the fierce and fervid industry of high-wrought America. The very reverse is the fact. One great problem is the necessary labor to develop these islands—to build the roads, open the mines, clear the wilderness, drain the swamps, dredge the harbors. The natives will not supply it. A lingering prejudice against the Chinese may prevent us from letting them supply it. Ultimately, when the real truth of the climate and human conditions is known, it is barely possible that our labor will go there. Even now young men with the right moral fiber and a little capital can make fortunes there as planters.

But the natives will not come here. Let all men dismiss that fear. The Dutch have Java, and its population, under Holland's rule, has increased from 2,000,000 to more than 20,000,000 people; yet the Java laborer has never competed with the laborer of Holland. And this is true of England and Germany, of every colonizing, administering power. The native has produced luxuries for the laborer of the governing country and afforded a market for what the laborer of the governing country in turn produced.

In Paluan the natives are primitive. In Sulu and Mindanao the Moros are vigorous and warlike, but have not the most elementary notions of civilization. For example, they do not understand the utility of roads. Nothing exists but paths through the jungle. I have ridden for hours in Sulu over the most primitive paths, barely discernible in the rank grass. They have not grasped the idea of private and permanent property in land, and yet there is no lovelier spot, no richer land, no better military and naval base than the Sulu group. In Paluan, Sulu, and Mindanao the strictest military government is necessary indefinitely. The inhabitants can never be made to work, can never be civilized. Their destiny can not be foretold. But whether they will withstand civilization or disappear before it, our duty is plain.

OUTLINE OF PLAN OF GOVERNMENT NEEDED IN THE PHILIPPINES: "SIMPLE AND STRONG."

In all other islands our government must be simple and strong. It must be a uniform government. Different forms for different islands will produce perpetual disturbance, because the people of each island would think that the people of the other islands are more favored than they. In Panay I heard murmurings that we were giving Negroes an American constitution. This is a human quality, found even in America, and we must never forget that in dealing with the Filipinos we deal with children. And so our government must be simple and strong. Simple and strong! The meaning of those two words must be written in every line of Philippine legislation, realized in every act of Philippine administration. A Philippine office in our Department of State; an American governor-general in Manila, with power to meet daily emergencies; possibly an advisory council with no power except that of discussing measures with the governor-general, which council would be the germ for future legislatures, a school in practical government; American lieutenant-governors in each province, with a like council about him; if possible, an American resident in each district and a like council grouped about him; frequent and unannounced visits of provincial governors to the districts of their province; periodical reports to the governor-general; an American board of visitation to make semiannual trips to the archipelago without power of suggestion or interference to officials or people, but only to report and recommend to the Philippine office of our State Department; a Philippine civil service, with promotion for efficiency; the abolition of duties on exports from the Philippines; the establishment of import duties on a revenue basis, with such discrimination in favor of American imports as will prevent the cheaper goods of other nations from destroying American trade; a complete reform of local taxation on a just and scientific basis, beginning with the establishment of a tax on land according to its assessed value; the minting of abundant money for Philippine and oriental use; the granting of franchises and concessions upon the theory of developing the resources of the archipelago, and therefore not by sale, but upon participation in the profits of the enterprise; the formation of a system of public schools everywhere with compulsory attendance rigidly enforced; the establishment of the English language throughout the islands, teaching it exclusively in the schools and using it, through interpreters, exclusively in the courts; a simple civil code and a still simpler criminal code, and both common to all the islands except Sulu, Mindanao, and Paluan; American judges for all but smallest offenses; gradual, slow, and careful introduction of the best Filipinos into the working machinery of the government, no promise whatever of the franchise until the people have been prepared for it; all this backed by the necessary force to execute it; this outline of government the situation demands as soon as tranquillity is established. Until then military government is advisable.

ENGLISH OR DUTCH SYSTEMS IMPOSSIBLE—PROTECTORATE IMPRACTICABLE.

We can not adopt the Dutch method in Java, nor the English method in the Malay states, because both of these systems rest on and operate through the existing governments of hereditary princes, with Dutch or English residents as advisers. But in the Philippines there are no such hereditary rulers, no such established governments. There is no native machinery of administration except that of the villages. The people have been deprived of the advantages of hereditary native princes, and yet not instructed in any form of regular, just, and orderly government.

Neither is a protectorate practicable. If a protectorate leaves the natives to their own methods more than would our direct administration of their government, it would permit the very evils which it is our duty to prevent. If, on the other hand, under a protectorate, we interfere to prevent those evils, we govern as much as if we directly administer the government, but without system or constructive purpose. In either alternative we incur all the responsibility of directly governing them ourselves, without any of the benefits to us, to them, or to the archipelago, which our direct administration of government throughout the islands would secure.

KIND OF AMERICAN OFFICIALS NECESSARY.

Even the elemental plan I have outlined will fail in the hands of any but ideal administrators. Spain did not utterly fail in devising—many of her plans were excellent; she failed in administering. Her officials as a class were corrupt, indolent, cruel, immoral. They were selected to please a faction in Spain, to placate members of the Cortes, to bribe those whom the Government feared. They were seldom selected for their fitness. They were the spawn of Government favor and Government fear, and therefore of Government iniquity.

The men we send to administer civilized government in the Philippines must be themselves the highest examples of our civilization. I use the word examples, for examples they must be in that word's most absolute sense. They must be men of the world and of affairs, students of their fellow-men, not theorists nor dreamers. They must be brave men, physically as well as morally. They must be as incorruptible as honor, as stainless as purity, men whom no force can frighten, no influence coerce, no money buy. Such men come high, even here in America. But they must be had. Better pure military occupation for years than government by any other quality of administration. Better abandon this priceless possession, admit ourselves incompetent to do our part in the world-redeeming work of our imperial race; better now haul down the flag of arduous deeds for civilization and run up the flag of reaction and decay than to apply academic notions of self-government to these children or attempt their government by any but the most perfect administrators our country can produce. I assert that such administrators can be found.

There is one in Cuba now who, with the words "Money is not everything," refused $30,000 a year as president of a corporation that he might continue the work of our race in the regeneration of Santiago, and thus announced and typified the new ideal of the Republic, which pessimists declared had become sordid and base. And among our 80,000,000 we have thousands like him. Necessity will produce them. Let no one fear that our party workers will seek to fill these places without regard to fitness. I know well this most maligned and most valuable class of American citizens—the precinct committeemen and party workers in the country districts of the Republic—and if we truthfully, bravely state the situation at the outset, these very politicians will insist most strenuously of all on the highest possible qualification in the administration of our possessions.

OUR ADMINISTRATORS MUST BE EXAMPLES.

I repeat that our government and our administrators must be examples. You can not teach the Filipino by precept. An object lesson is the only lesson he comprehends. He has no conception of pure, orderly, equal, impartial government, under equal laws justly administered, because he has never seen such a government. He must be shown the simplest results of good government by actual example in order that he may begin to understand its most elementary principles.

Such a government will have its effect upon us here in America, too. Model administration there will be an example created by ourselves for model administration here; and our own example is the only one Americans ever heed. It is not true that charity begins at home. Selfishness begins there; but charity begins abroad and ends in its full glory in the home. It is not true that perfect government must be achieved at home before administering it abroad; it exercises abroad is a suggestion, an example, and a stimulus for the best government at home. It is as if we projected ourselves upon a living screen and beheld ourselves at work. England to-day is the home of ideal municipal governments. Well, England's administration of Bombay did not divert attention from Glasgow, and Glasgow is to-day the model for all students of municipal problems. England's sanitary regeneration of filthy Calcutta made it clearer that Birmingham must be regenerated, too, and to-day Birmingham is the municipal admiration of all instructed men. England's miracle in Egypt, surpassing the ancient one of turning rods into serpents because the modern miracle turns serpents into men, deserts into gardens, famine into plenty—England's work in the land of the sphinx has solved its profound riddle, exalted not England only, but all the world, by its noble example, and thrilled to the soul every citizen of Great Britain with civic pride in the achievements of the greatest civilizing empire of the world. "Cast thy bread upon the waters and after many days it shall return unto you." "With what measure ye meet, it shall be meted to you again."

DOMINANT NOTES OF OUR FIRST AND SECOND CENTURIES.

Mr. President, self-government and internal development have been the dominant notes of our first century; administration and the development of other lands will be the dominant notes of our second century. And administration is as high and holy a function as self-government, just as the care of a trust estate is as sacred an obligation as the management of our own concerns. Cain was the first to violate the divine law of human society which makes of us our brother's keeper. And administration of good government is the first lesson in self-government, that exalted estate toward which all civilization tends.

Administration of good government is not denial of liberty. For what is liberty? It is not savagery. It is not the exercise of individual will. It is not dictatorship. It involves government, but not necessarily self-government. It means law. First of all, it is a common rule of action, applying equally to all within its limits. Liberty means protection of property and life without price, free speech without intimidation, justice without purchase or delay, government without favor or favorites. What will best give all this to the people of the Philippines—American administration, developing them gradually toward self-government, or self-government by a people before they know what self-government means?

TRUE INTERPRETATION OF DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

The Declaration of Independence does not forbid us to do our part in the regeneration of the world. If it did, the Declaration would be wrong, just as the Articles of Confederation, drafted by the very same men who signed the Declaration, was found to be wrong. The Declaration has no application to the present situation. It was written by self-governing men for self-governing men.

It was written by men who, for a century and a half, had been experimenting in self-government on this continent, and whose ancestors for hundreds of years before had been gradually developing toward that high and holy estate. The Declaration applies only to people capable of self-government. How dare any man prostitute this expression of the very elect of self-governing peoples to a race of Malay children of barbarism, schooled in Spanish methods and ideas? And you, who say the Declaration applies to all men, how dare you deny its application to the American Indian?

And if you deny it to the Indian at home, how dare you grant it to the Malay abroad?

PHRASE "CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED" MISUNDERSTOOD.

The Declaration does not contemplate that all government must have the consent of the governed. It announces that man's "inalienable rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are established among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that when any form of government becomes destructive of those rights, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it." "Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are the important things; "consent of the governed" is one of the means to those ends.

If "any form of government becomes destructive of those ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it," says the Declaration. "Any forms" includes all forms. Thus the Declaration itself recognizes other forms of government than those resting on the consent of the governed. The word "consent" itself recognizes other forms, for "consent" means the understanding of the thing to which the "consent" is given; and there are people in the world who do not understand any form of government. And the sense in which "consent" is used in the Declaration is broader than mere understanding; for "consent" in the Declaration means participation in the government "consented" to. And yet these people who are not capable of "consenting" to any form of government must be governed.

And so the Declaration contemplates all forms of government which secure the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Self-government, when that will best secure these ends, as in the case of people capable of self-government; other appropriate forms when people are not capable of self-government. And so the authors of the Declaration themselves governed the Indian without his consent; the inhabitants of Louisiana without their consent; and ever since the sons of the makers of the Declaration have been governing not by theory, but by practice, after the fashion of our governing race, now by one form, now by another, but always for the purpose of securing the great eternal ends of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, not in the savage, but in the civilized meaning of those terms—life according to orderly methods of civilized society; liberty regulated by law; pursuit of happiness limited by the pursuit of happiness by every other man.

If this is not the meaning of the Declaration, our Government itself denies the Declaration every time it receives the representative of any but a republican form of government, such as that of the Sultan, the Czar, or other absolute autocrats, whose governments, according to the opposition's interpretation of the Declaration, are spurious governments, because the people governed have not "consented" to them.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER TO GOVERN AS WE PLEASE.

Senators in opposition are estopped from denying our constitutional power to govern the Philippines as circumstances may demand, for such power is admitted in the case of Florida, Louisiana, Alaska. How, then, is it denied in the Philippines? Is there a geographical interpretation to the Constitution? Do degrees of longitude fix constitutional limitations? Does a thousand miles of ocean diminish constitutional power more than a thousand miles of land?

The ocean does not separate us from the field of our duty and endeavor—it joins us, an established highway needing no repair, and landing us at any point desired. The seas do not separate the Philippine Islands from us or from each other. The seas are highways through the archipelago, which would cost hundreds of millions of dollars to construct if they were land instead of water. Land may separate men from their desire, the ocean never. Russia has been centuries in crossing Siberian wastes; the Puritans crossed the Atlantic in brief and flying weeks.

If the Boers must have traveled by land, they would never have reached the Transvaal; but they sailed on liberty's ocean; they walked on civilization's untaxed highway, the welcoming sea. Our ships habitually sailed round the cape and anchored in California's harbors before a single trail had lined the desert with the whitening bones of those who made it. No! No! The ocean unites us; steam unites us; electricity unites us; all the elements of nature unite us to the region where duty and interest call us. There is in the ocean no constitutional argument against the march of the flag, for the oceans, too, are ours. With more extended coast lines than any nation of history; with a commerce vaster than any other people ever dreamed of, and that commerce as yet only in its beginnings; with naval traditions equaling those of England or of Greece, and the work of our Navy only just begun; with the air of the ocean in our nostrils and the blood of a sailor ancestry in our veins; with the shores of all the continents calling us, the great Republic before I die will be the acknowledged lord of the world's high seas. And over them the Republic will hold dominion, by virtue of the strength God has given it, for the peace of the world and the betterment of man.

WORDS OF EMPIRE EXPRESSLY IN CONSTITUTION.

No; the oceans are not limitations of the power which the Constitution expressly gives Congress to govern all territory the nation may acquire. The Constitution declares that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States." Not the Northwest Territory only; not Louisiana or Florida only; not territory on this continent only, but any territory anywhere belonging to the nation. The founders of the nation were not provincial. Theirs was the geography of the world. They were soldiers as well as landmen, and they knew that where our ships should go our flag might follow. They had the logic of progress, and they knew that the Republic they were planting must, in obedience to the laws of our expanding race, necessarily develop into the greater Republic which the world beholds to-day, and into the still mightier Republic which the world will finally acknowledge as the arbiter, under God, of the destinies of mankind. And so our fathers wrote into the Constitution these words of growth, of expansion, of empire, if you will, unlimited by geography or climate or by anything but the vitality and possibilities of the American people: "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States."

POWER IMPLIED TO GOVERN AS WE PLEASE.

The power to govern all territory the nation may acquire would have been in Congress if the language affirming that power had not been written in the Constitution. For not all powers of the National Government are expressed. Its principal powers are implied. The written Constitution is but the index of the living Constitution. Had this not been true, the Constitution would have failed. For the people in any event would have developed and progressed. And if the Constitution had not had the capacity for growth corresponding with the growth of the nation, the Constitution would and should have been abandoned as the Articles of Confederation were abandoned. For the Constitution is not immortal in itself, is not useful even in itself. The Constitution is immortal and even useful only as it serves the orderly development of the nation. The nation alone is immortal. The nation alone is sacred. The Army is its servant. The Navy is its servant. The President is its servant. This Senate is its servant. Our laws are its methods. Our Constitution is its instrument.

This is the golden rule of constitutional interpretation: The Constitution was made for the people, not the people for the Constitution.

Hamilton recognized this golden rule when he formulated the doctrine of implied powers. Marshall recognized it when he applied that doctrine to constitutional interpretation in McCulloch vs. Maryland. Congress recognized it when it provided for internal improvements. The Supreme Court of the Republic recognized it when it confirmed the act of Congress in making the promissory notes of the Republic legal tender for debts. Washington recognized it when he sent the nation's soldiers to suppress local riot in 1794; and Lincoln, the soul and symbol of the common people, recognized the doctrine of implied powers in every effort he made to save the nation. There is no power expressed in the Constitution to charter a bank; and although the subject was familiar to the framers of the Constitution, who still remained silent on it, Marshall said that this power was implied. There is no power expressed in the Constitution to make internal improvements; and although it was a subject painfully before the framers of the Constitution, who yet remained silent upon it, Congress said it is implied.

There is no power expressed in the Constitution, but almost the reverse, to make anything but gold and silver legal tender for payment of debts; the Supreme Court declared it is implied. There is no power expressed in the Constitution to maintain order in a State with the nation's soldiers unless the State first calls for aid; Washington, Lincoln, and Cleveland said it is implied. The legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments of our Government have recognized and confirmed the doctrine of implied powers, by which alone the Constitution lives, the people make progress, and the Republic marches forward to its imperial destiny. "The letter killeth; but the spirit giveth life."

By the same reasoning that Hamilton, Marshall, Washington, and Lincoln employed we could infer our power to do the work of administering government in the Philippines as the situation may demand, even if that power had not been affirmed in express words. We could infer it from the purpose of the Constitution to "provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare" of the nation and the power given Congress to make laws to secure these ends. For the archipelago is a base for the commerce of the East. It is a base for military and naval operations against the only powers with whom conflict is possible; a fortress thrown up in the Pacific, defending our Western coast, commanding the waters of the Orient, and giving us a point from which we can instantly strike and seize the possession of any possible foe.

MAY GOVERN UNDER ANY FORM WE PLEASE.

The nation's power to make rules and regulations for the government of its possessions is not confined to any given set of rules or regulations. It is not confined to any particular formula of laws or kind of government or type of administration. Where do Senators find constitutional warrant for any special kind of government in "territory belonging to the United States." The language affirming our power to govern such territory is as broad as the requirements of all possible situations. And there is nothing in the Constitution to limit that comprehensive language. The very reverse is true. For power to administer government anywhere and in any manner the situation demands would have been in Congress if the Constitution had been silent; not merely because it is a power not reserved to the States or people; not merely because it is a power inherent in and an attribute of nationality; not even because it might be inferred from other specific provisions of the Constitution; but because it is the power most necessary for the ruling tendency of our race—the tendency to explore, expand, and grow, to sail new seas and seek new lands, subdue the wilderness, revitalize decaying peoples, and plant civilized and civilizing governments over all the globe.

For the makers of the Constitution were of the race that produced Hawkins, and Drake, and Raleigh, and Smith, and Winthrop, and Penn. They were of the great exploring, pioneering, colonizing, and governing race who went forth with trade or gain or religious liberty as the immediate occasion for their voyages, but really because they could not help it; because the blood within them commanded them; because their racial tendency is as resistless as the currents of the sea or the process of the suns or any other elemental movement of nature, of which that racial tendency itself is the most majestic. And when they wrote the Constitution they did not mean to negative the most elemental characteristic of their race, of which their own presence in America was an expression and an example. You can not interpret a constitution without understanding the race that wrote it. And if our fathers had intended a reversal of the very nature and being of their race, they would have so declared in the most emphatic words our language holds. But they did not, and in the absence of such words the power would remain which is essential to the strongest tendency of our practical race, to govern wherever we are, and to govern by the methods best adapted to the situation. But our fathers were not content with silence, and they wrote in the Constitution the words which affirm this essential and imperial power.

THE WHOLE QUESTION ELEMENTAL.

Mr. President, this question is deeper than any question of party politics; deeper than any question of the isolated policy of our country even; deeper even than any question of constitutional power. It is elemental. It is racial. God has not been preparing the English-speaking and Teutonic peoples for a thousand years for nothing but vain and idle self-contemplation and self-admiration. No! He has made us the master organizers of the world to establish system where chaos reigns. He has given us the spirit of progress to overwhelm the forces of reaction throughout the earth. He has made us adepts in government that we may administer government among savage and senile peoples. Were it not for such a force as this the world would relapse into barbarism and night. And of all our race He has marked the American people as His chosen nation to finally lead in the regeneration of the world. This is the divine mission of America, and it holds for us all the profit, all the glory, all the happiness possible to man. We are trustees of the world's progress, guardians of its righteous peace. The judgment of the Master is upon us: "Ye have been faithful over a few things; I will make you ruler over many things."

What shall history say of us? Shall it say that we renounced that holy trust, left the savage to his base condition, the wilderness to the reign of waste, deserted duty, abandoned glory, forgot our sordid profit even, because we feared our strength and read the charter of our powers with the doubter's eye and the quibbler's mind? Shall it say that, called by events to captain and command the proudest, ablest, purest race of history in history's noblest work, we declined that great commission? Our fathers would not have had it so. No! They founded no paralytic government, incapable of the simplest acts of administration. They planted no sluggish people, passive while the world's work calls them. They established no reactionary nation. They unfurled no retreating flag.

GOD'S HAND IN ALL.

That flag has never paused in its onward march. Who dares halt it now—now, when history's largest events are carrying it forward; now, when we are at last one people, strong enough for any task, great enough for any glory destiny can bestow? How comes it that our first century closes with the process of consolidating the American people into a unit just accomplished, and quick upon the stroke of that great hour presses upon us our world opportunity, world duty, and world glory, which none but a people welded into an indivisible nation can achieve or perform?

Blind indeed is he who sees not the hand of God in events so vast, so harmonious, so benign. Reactionary indeed is the mind that perceives not that this vital people is the strongest of the saving forces of the world; that our place, therefore, is at the head of the constructing and redeeming nations of the earth; and that to stand aside while events march on is a surrender of our interests, a betrayal of our duty as blind as it is base. Craven indeed is the heart that fears to perform a work so golden and so noble; that dares not win a glory so immortal.

Do you tell me that it will cost us money? When did Americans ever measure duty by financial standards? Do you tell me of the tremendous toil required to overcome the vast difficulties of our task? What mighty work for the world, for humanity, even for ourselves, has ever been done with ease? Even our bread must we eat by the sweat of our faces. Why are we charged with power such as no people ever knew, if we are not to use it in a work such as no people ever wrought? Who will dispute the divine meaning of the fable of the talents?

Do you remind me of the precious blood that must be shed, the lives that must be given, the broken hearts of loved ones for their slain? And this is indeed a heavier price than all combined. And yet as a nation every historic duty we have done, every achievement we have accomplished, has been by the sacrifice of our noblest sons. Every holy memory that glorifies the flag is of those heroes who have died that its onward march might not be stayed. It is the nation's dearest lives yielded for the flag that makes it dear to us; it is the nation's most precious blood poured out for it that makes it precious to us. That flag is woven of heroism and grief, of the bravery of men and women's tears, of righteousness and battle, of sacrifice and anguish, of triumph and of glory. It is these which make our flag a holy thing. Who would tear from that sacred banner the glorious legends of a single battle where it has waved on land or sea? What son of a soldier of the flag whose father fell beneath it on any field would surrender that proud record for the heraldry of a king? In the cause of civilization, in the service of the Republic anywhere on earth, Americans consider wounds the noblest decorations man can win, and count the giving of their lives a glad and precious duty.

Pray God that spirit never fails. Pray God the time may never come when Mammon and the love of ease shall so debase our blood that we will fear to shed it for the flag and its imperial destiny. Pray God the time may never come when American heroism is but a legend like the story of the Old American faith in our mission and our might a dream dissolved, and the glory of our mighty race departed.

And that time will never come. We will renew our youth at the fountain of new and glorious deeds. We will exalt our reverence for the flag by carrying it to a noble future as well as by remembering its ineffable past. Its immortality will not pass, because everywhere and always we will acknowledge and discharge the solemn responsibilities our sacred flag, in its deepest meaning, puts upon us. And so, Senators, with reverent hearts, where dwells the fear of God, the American people move forward to the future of their hope and the doing of His work.

Mr. President and Senators, adopt the resolution offered, that peace may quickly come and that we may begin our saving, regenerating, and uplifting work. Adopt it, and this bloodshed will cease when these deluded children of our islands learn that this is the final word of the representatives of the American people in Congress assembled. Reject it, and the world, history, and the American people will know where to forever fix the awful responsibility for the consequences that will surely follow such failure to do our manifest duty. How dare we delay when our soldiers' blood is flowing? [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Applause is not permitted in the United States Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will suspend for one moment. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, as I understand no Senator wishes to speak upon it this afternoon, and I desire to make a very few observations on the pending resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have listened, delighted, as have, I suppose, all the members of the Senate, to the eloquence of my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. I am glad to welcome to the public service his enthusiasm, his patriotism, his silver speech, and the earnestness and the courage with which he has devoted himself to a discharge of his duty to the Republic as he conceives it. Yet, Mr. President, as I heard his eloquent description of wealth and glory and commerce and trade, I listened in vain for those words which the American people have been wont to take upon their lips in every solemn crisis of their history. I heard much calculated to excite the imagination of the youth seeking wealth or the youth charmed by the dream of empire. But the words Right, Justice, Duty, Freedom were absent, my friend must permit me to say, from that eloquent speech. I could think as this brave young Republic of ours listened to what he had to say of but one occurrence:

Then the devil taketh Him up into an exceeding high mountain and sheweth Him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them.

And the devil said unto Him, "All these things will I give Thee if Thou wilt fall down and worship me."

Then saith Jesus unto him, "Get thee behind me, Satan."

Mr. President, the Senator himself and the evidence coming from our two commanders, General Otis and Admiral Dewey, and witnesses for whom they vouch, refute every one of the propositions of fact on which my honorable friend has built his glittering temple of glass. He describes the impotence and ineffectual attempt of Spain for three hundred years to reduce that people to subjection; tells us that she had failed. He counsels us to avoid the errors and the mistakes and the sins she has committed. If that be true, Mr. President, where did Spain get the right to sell the people of the Philippine Islands to us? They had risen against that effete and impotent and ineffectual effort of Spain; they had driven her from the entire soil of their island, save a single city; they hemmed in her troops in that single city of Manila by a cordon of their troops stretching from water to water; and Spain surrendered to us only because her soldiers could not get out of reach of the American guns without being compelled to surrender to the Filipinos.

I think you will have to enlarge the doctrines of the American Declaration of Independence. I think you will have to build anew a Constitution which, he says, is only an instrument and not a rule of duty, before you can find your right to buy and sell that people like sheep.

My honorable friend, I am sure, when he reflects upon it, will never advise the people of the United States to do a base thing for all this wealth, for all this glory, for all this empire. I say if it be true that that was a people that desired independence and were fit for independence, then it would be a base thing for this young giant in its might to strike down that infant republic. Do you not think so? [Addressing Mr. BEVERIDGE.] If you do think so, I can prove to the Senate every one of these propositions from the testimony of Otis and of Dewey and of Schurman and of the witnesses for whom they vouch.

The Senator said that he said it in the sorrow of his heart, and he would not have said it if he had not been compelled to say it, that all this blood and warfare and loss of life and expense of treasure in this war was occasioned by utterances at home and, he was sorry to say, by speeches in the American Senate. The debate in the American Senate on this subject began—with the single exception of a brief and calm constitutional discussion by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]—on the 9th of January, 1899.

Now, let us see what happened. I have in my hand the report of Major-General Otis; and without detaining the Senate at this hour in the afternoon, for I shall have occasion to speak more at length on this subject later, all through that report and through that whole summer are found again and again communications to the Government of the United States that the people of the Philippine Islands desire their independence; that is one thing; that they are a people; so the President calls them; and that is the phrase which the Declaration of Independence uses when it says a people have a right to establish their government in such form as they conceive to be necessary for their safety and happiness. Then Aguinaldo was brought over there to a people 30,000 of whom were in arms as an organized army before he went, and he was placed at the head of that people, who were desiring independence, and furnished with arms by the Government of the United States. That was the condition of things until Manila was surrounded, the Spanish army captured, and the surrender of Manila was effected.

I have here the report—and I have seen the original, and it is from the Navy Department—of two naval officers, which Admiral Dewey certifies under his own hand gives the best account of the condition of things in northern Luzon that is in existence. That is the Admiral's own statement. Those officers made a journey through the island of Luzon in the months of October, November, and I think a few days in December, 1898, just before hostilities broke out, and they report everywhere courts, municipal government, peace and order, the Spanish prisoners kindly treated, schools and churches; that they were received with elegance and hospitality, I will not say such as my friend would receive me with if I went to Indiana, but with a very much more gracious and generous hospitality than it would be in my humble power to receive him with if he came to Massachusetts.

They report schoolbooks, and report the constant, eager desire of that people for education. I have all the extracts here before me, and here is the summing up. This is the original report which I have got from the Navy Department, and here is George Dewey's certificate, dated December 1, 1898. I am going to ask the Senate to print it:

Special attention is invited to this interesting and carefully prepared report, which in my opinion contains the most complete and reliable information obtainable in regard to the present state of the northern part of Luzon Island.

GEORGE DEWEY.

DECEMBER 1, 1898.

Everywhere a people in better order than is found at this moment, to say nothing of what was found at the time of their revolution, in some countries on the continent of America between the Rio Grande and Cape Horn. They were a people fitter for self-government than were those of any country on the continent of America from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn when its independence from Spain was achieved, and fitter than some of them are to-day.

Mr. President, it is that which you want to crush out and that from which the American flag is supposed to get new glory if we stamp it out—this young giant of ours in the freshness and the fullness of his strength—and that you call glory!

What happened in regard to this outbreak which was caused by the debate in the United States Senate which began on the 9th of January, 1899? I have General Otis's report here. In December, 1898, the President sent to General Otis a famous proclamation—mark the date, December, 1898—and it contains a statement asserting the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands and our purpose to give them a good government, but that we must take possession of the entire island and keep them, and so on.

Otis read it and he suppressed the President's statement. He said that that language was calculated to create an immediate outbreak of hostilities. I have his exact language here. I will read it:

After fully considering the President's proclamation and the temper of the Tagalos with whom I was daily discussing political problems and the friendly intentions of the United States Government toward them, I concluded that there were certain words and expressions therein, such as "sovereignty," "right of cession," and those which directed immediate occupation, etc., which, though most admirably employed and tersely expressive of actual conditions, might be advantageously used by the Tagalo war party to incite widespread hostilities among the natives. The ignorant classes—had been taught to believe that certain words, as "sovereignty," "protection," etc., had peculiar meaning disastrous to their welfare and significant of future political domination, like that from which they had recently been freed.

These fellows, incapable of self-government according to my friend—

Now, Mr. President, I have seen in my youth in Massachusetts—I do not know much about Indiana—ignorant fellows who believed that precise thing here at home, and who are undoubtedly unfit for self-government according to him. There are certain men in Massachusetts, and the woods are full of them, who would think that if Great Britain or any other nation should come and propose to assume sovereignty and protection and immediate occupation and take possession of Massachusetts, they would be excited and alarmed and would fly to arms, and they would think even that there was a certain glory in giving their lives to prevent that sort of thing from being done.

But whether that be true or not, whether I misunderstand the temper of this great American people, whether I misunderstand what the American flag stands for or not, that is what I thought it stood for. But I dare say I am mistaken in that belief.

At any rate, that is what General Otis said. So he took the most extraordinary responsibility ever assumed by a military commander in regard to his superior's orders, and suppressed President McKinley's proclamation, a proclamation which would, as he says, have created armed hostilities and an outbreak immediately, as it would have been likely to do wherever there is human nature and human feeling and love of liberty.

But he issued a proclamation in its stead, which he gives here. My honorable friend thinks the Filipinos are not fit for self-government, and he says there are only, as I understand it, about a hundred in the island who are. He cites the evidence of a good many employers of labor who say there are a great many more, but that is his summing up of it. General Otis, instead of this proclamation which the President directed him to issue and which he thought would bring on a war, goes on and issues a proclamation in which he promises them independence. That is the next thing that happened in December. Here it is. I shall have occasion to go into this matter more at length when I have more time. I will read one of his sentences:

It is also my belief that it is the intention of the United States Government to draw from the Filipino people as much of the military force of the islands as is possible and consistent with a free and well-constituted government of the country. * * * I am also convinced that it is the intention of the United States Government to seek the establishment of a most liberal government for the islands, in which the people themselves shall have as full representation as the maintenance of law and order will permit, and which shall be susceptible of development, on lines of increased representation and the bestowal of increased powers, into a government as free and independent as is enjoyed by the most favored provinces in the world.

That is what you told those men through your military commander six weeks before the hostilities broke out.

Mr. TELLER. What is the date of that report?

Mr. HOAR. It is dated January 4, 1899. There is the promise. In another statement he says:

I will assure the people of the Philippine Islands the full measure of individual rights and liberties, which is the heritage of a free people.

Now, what does that mean? What does that mean, Mr. President? My honorable friend says we must hold onto those islands forever; that he is a dastard who does not think so. And yet General Otis, whom the honorable Senator as I have no doubt justly eulogized, as the representative of the honor and the justice of the people of the United States, uttered that promise. Did he utter that promise to a people of slaves, half Spaniards and half savages in character? Did he utter that promise to a people incapable of self-government? He sent home his dispatch, and he is in command there now. Now, what happened?

General Otis states that he sent the original proclamation of the President containing these words, which were sure to bring on an outbreak of hostilities, to General Miller. General Miller was lying with a part of the United States fleet opposite Iloilo, where the Spaniards had been captured and the insurgent forces were in control. He was spoiling for a fight. He was urging Otis all the time to let him make an attack at once, "because," he said, "the insurgents are strengthening themselves every day."

General Otis says that, before having carefully read this proclamation, he incautiously sent a copy of it to Miller, and thereupon Miller, contrary to his desire, made it public, and the Philippine Island people got hold of it as it was originally made. So this document which your great military authority affirmed would bring on instant hostilities if it was published, and which he had taken the liberty to suppress, was published and sent abroad. Then he proceeds to give an account of the effect of the publication. He says:

The publication separated more widely the friendly and war factions of the inhabitants. * * * The ablest of insurgent newspapers, * * * edited by the uncompromising Luna, attacked it with all the vigor of which he was capable. * * * This paper was published in Tagalo; had a considerable circulation. * * * No statement reflecting upon the United States Government * * * was too base, untruthful, or improbable for newspaper circulation.

Was there anything worse for newspaper circulation than substituting a promise of independence for a purpose to take immediate possession, I should like to know?

Aguinaldo met the proclamation by a counter one, in which he indignantly—

I now read from General Otis's report—in which he indignantly protested against the claim of sovereignty by the United States in the islands which had really been conquered from the Spaniards through the blood and treasure of his countrymen. * * * Even the women of Cavite province * * * gave me to understand that after all the men were killed off they were prepared to shed their patriotic blood for the liberty and independence of their country.

Mr. President, I am proud as any man of the history of the United States. I suppose I feel a special and peculiar pride in the history of my own beloved State of Massachusetts. I have sat at her dear feet, I have looked into her beautiful eyes, I have listened to her high counsel from my earliest childhood. But I should feel prouder still if I could write into her glorious history a statement like that.

Is there any American Senator whose blood is so cold, whose eyes are so blinded by this wretched glitter and glare of empire which Satan is setting before us as he did before the Saviour, that his bosom can not be stirred by such a thing as that, or that he is willing to join in an attempt to trample under foot the liberties of a people like that? Have you read the death song of Rizal? It rises to the loftiest strains. Have you read the state papers of these men—these Filipinos? They will compare favorably with the state papers of any nation on the earth. Have you read their constitution?

Mr. President, I omitted to state one very simple fact given by these naval officers. There came a report into the province where they were being received as guests at the house of the principal magistrate of the village that our commissioners at Paris had rejected the proposition to buy them and had substituted for it what they did in regard to Cuba; and the commander of the military forces, on that report, which turned out to be a mistake, instantly resigned his authority to the civil magistrates and sheathed his sword.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please allow me to inquire if that is the statement made by the naval officers to Admiral Dewey?

Mr. HOAR. It was made by the naval officers. I have it in my desk.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will read it.

Mr. HOAR. Admiral Dewey vouches for it. It would take some time to hunt it up, but I have it here.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts is going to print it in his speech.

Mr. HOAR. I am going to print the whole of it in my speech.

Mr. BACON. I will withdraw the request, then.

Mr. HOAR. It is there. I should like to print also two very brief, clear narratives by the same officers, which appeared in two New York publications, if I may have leave.

I was going to ask, not referring to any Senator—I am referring to some outside statements—is it not a little bold to charge with the responsibility of making this war the men who tried to stop it, who protested against it, instead of the men who made it? There has not been a time from the beginning to this hour when assurances of General Otis, given the 1st of January, 1899, if repeated from Washington, that they should be as independent as the most favored provinces of the world, would not have prevented the outbreak. But although they got that, they got at the same time the true proclamation, which affirmed sovereignty and occupation and the right of cession, and pretty soon after it they got the news that they had been bought like a flock of sheep for $20,000,000.

The mistake of our honorable friends who disagree with me in this matter is that they do not understand that the God who made of one blood all the nations of the world has made all the nations of the world capable of being influenced by the same sentiments and the same motives, and that the love of liberty does not depend on the color of the skin, but that it depends on humanity. These men are God's children, as you are and as I am, and the men who boast that sublime and lofty parentage have had given them by the Universal Father the love of liberty and the sense of justice.

I had no intention of speaking this afternoon; and I have it not before me, but you will find in these reports that one of the officers makes the exact statement that the Filipinos are exceedingly sensitive to any matter of injustice, and all that they need is to know that they are to be treated with justice and righteousness.

I will ask leave also to print these two articles, which are very brief. I am not sure whether the statement I now refer to is in the magazine article or the report written by the same man.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that the Senator has asked consent to print the other paper?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; I ask consent to print the report forwarded by Admiral Dewey and articles in the Outlook and New York Independent by Messrs. Sargent and Wilcox, the two naval officers who made the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them be printed as a separate document.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I was going to incorporate them in my speech, but I should also like to have them printed as a document.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I ask that they be printed as a document.

Mr. HOAR. Let them be printed in both forms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts and of the Senator from Missouri, that the matter referred to be printed in the RECORD and also as a document? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

[See appendix.]

Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. President, my honorable friend thought that saying in a very feeble way such a thing as this in the Senate of the United States tended to excite hostilities in the Philippine Islands. If I understood him correctly, he said also that he thought it was not necessary to wait until we could get the very best of government here, but if we established it abroad under some commissioners to be appointed by some executive authority they would govern so well that they would furnish a good example for us at home and we should improve. I suppose, though he did not say it, that he thinks, also, we had better not have free speech here in the United States Senate until they have got it out among the Filipinos, to see whether it works there, and then it may come back to us in a way which gradually would permit us to use it here, in a sort of diluted form.

Mr. President, the Senator gave us his opinion of General Aguinaldo. Mr. Schurman, the president of the Filipino Commission and of Cornell University, says in a speech made to his students last week that he considers Aguinaldo an honest man. The two testimonials must of course stand side by side or one must fall before the other.

The Senator cites a good many witnesses from whom he concludes that the Filipinos are not capable of self-government, but when he reads the testimony of a great many of them the reason they give is that the lower and uneducated classes will take the advice and act under the influence of their leaders. His witnesses say that the self-government will work all right. But it is because the superior will influence the inferior. I looked around to see whether the Senator from Indiana was likely to have the full assent of my honorable friend the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], or my honorable friend the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], who happens to be present, to the proposition that it is a sign of absolute unfitness for self-government which justifies us in slaughtering that people and putting them under our heels that the poor ignorant classes are likely to act under the influence of their leaders and follow them. [Laughter.] The late honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Quay] is not present. I trust my honorable friend will not be influenced in his vote on the constitutional question of admitting Senator Quay by any idea that Mr. Quay may possibly be penetrated by that Philippine notion.

Mr. President, I wish to read an extract from a letter which is one of a great many letters I have received. I had one within two days from an eminent general officer thoroughly sympathizing with my position in this matter, a man who came home with a great and a brave record, but who said that while the excited condition exists he does not want to have his name used and he should say nothing. I have here a letter from a soldier, who says:

I am a returned volunteer who believes the United States is pursuing a wrong course in the Philippines. There are thousands of others, I believe, who, in spite of the noisy receptions, the glamor and glory and medal promises, believe the same way. I promised myself before leaving the islands to enlist another two years if necessary to help bring the Government back to the "humanity" policy stated when it enlisted us to fight. Though a private soldier, my word may weigh little, but I feel it will be a source of pleasure in the future to remember that at this critical period in our history I was spending time and money to help in my humble way to bring the nation back to her old-fashioned ideas of liberty.

I would come to Washington if I could be of any service, but you doubtless have plenty of soldiers and others at hand better capable than myself to answer your questions. I hope you will put up the fight of your life against the Administration's policy. It seems to me you can do a great deal of good by acquainting the people with the real condition of things in the islands, which no one knows better than yourself that they do not get through the papers. The death of General Lawton almost in sight of the church steeples of Manila, in a battle that lasted three hours in taking a town our forces captured several times before, but never before found it so hard to take as this time—this of itself should make sensible people doubt that the war is "just over now." The Army of late has been making a good showing, but Congress should realize that every Filipino under arms there to-day means to have and has sworn to have "liberty or death."

Who was it who used that phrase? Is there a Senator from Virginia here who remembers where that expression came from? The miserable Filipino got hold of it somehow. I rather think on the whole we had better charge this whole bloodshed and slaughter and loss of life and treasure to Patrick Henry. The writer of this letter says Congress should realize that every Filipino under arms there to-day—believes that down under our commercial greed must still smolder in our hearts a feeling that respects him for this resolution.

Just think of this man, who has been so long in the Philippine Islands, actually so far conspiring with the Filipino insurgent cause that he believes, and says the Filipino believes—those savage barbarians believe of the American people "that down under our commercial greed must still smolder in our hearts a feeling that respects him for this resolution."

We may have been more humane to our prisoners, but our Army has been a greater scourge to their country than the Spanish army in a hundred years. But still they dispute every advance and close in in the wake of every retreat. They are not savages, Senator, as you know, of course. I want to tell you how our regiment changed its mind upon this point. We had been taught (the devil only knows why) that the Filipinos were savages no better than our Indians.

But General Lawton took half my regiment with him on the Santa Cruz expedition. The boys came back with different ideas, denied that they were savages, and confessed they did not want to fight them any more. They had seen in their deserted houses schoolbooks everywhere—grammars, geographies, and arithmetics—well thumbed. They had seen schoolhouses, churches, government buildings, halls of justice, paintings, decorations, and all kinds of handwork; a city paved, cleaned, and drained, happy in peace and plenty, before they came on their mission of distributing the peace commissioners' proclamation. After this trip neither the "nigger" nor "Indian" talk made them enthusiastic soldiers.

One thing more: The papers announce that the Filipinos are to do honor to General Lawton. This, whether intended or not, puts things in a false light. The fact is, there are a lot of Filipinos working for and hanging on to the Americans because of the big wages they pay, and much of this money is sent through the lines one way or another to help the insurgents. Nine out of every ten of these men are at heart in sympathy with the insurgent cause. The people should know these things.

Pardon me, Senator, for addressing one who must at this time be burdened with correspondence, but I felt I must say a word and tell you one soldier at least respects the American traditions, etc.

I shall have occasion, Mr. President, to discuss this question at some length hereafter. I desire to ask leave to print with my speech an appeal made by Felipe Buencamino, setting forth the desires and aspirations of the Filipino people, addressed to the House of Representatives. I suppose it does not come in regularly as a petition, but I should like to have it to refer to. I wish to have it printed in connection with my speech and also as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire that it shall be included in the other document or printed as a separate document?

Mr. HOAR. I think it would be well to include it in the other document. I desire to have it printed with my speech and also as a document. I add, also, this letter from Gen. Charles King:

[Gen. Charles King's letter to Milwaukee Journal.]

THE FILIPINOS AS THEY ARE.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 22, 1899.

To the Editor of the Journal, Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR SIR: Thinking over your telegram and request of June 7, I find myself seriously embarrassed. As an officer of the Army, there are many reasons why I should not give my "views of situation in the Philippines, how long fighting is likely to continue, and thoughts as to America's part in future of islands."

The capability of the Filipinos for self-government can not be doubted. Such men as Arellano, Aguinaldo, and many others whom I might name are highly educated; nine-tenths of the people read and write, all are skilled artisans in one way or another; they are industrious, frugal, temperate, and, given a fair start, could look out for themselves infinitely better than our people imagine. In my opinion they rank far higher than the Cubans or the uneducated negroes to whom we have given the right of suffrage.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES KING,
Brigadier-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the paper to which he refers be printed as a part of his speech and also as a document? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

THE BACKWOODS FILIPINO.

[By Leonard R. Sargent.]

It has been my privilege to have been intimately associated with the Filipino people for a short time at a most interesting period of their history. With the permission of Admiral Dewey, I spent the greater part of the months of October and November of 1898, in company with Paymaster W. B. Wilcox, United States Navy, in the interior of the northern part of the island of Luzon. It will be remembered that at that date the United States had not yet announced its policy with regard to the Philippines. The terms of the treaty with Spain were being negotiated by our commissioners at Paris, and the fate of the islands hung in the balance. In the meantime the native population, taking matters into their own hands, had declared their independence from all foreign jurisdiction and had set up a provisional government, with Aguinaldo at its head.

Although this government has never been recognized, and in all probability will go out of existence without recognition, yet it can not be denied that, in a region occupied by many millions of inhabitants, for nearly six months it stood alone between anarchy and order. The military forces of the United States held control only in Manila, with its environs, and in Cavite, and had no authority to proceed further; while in the vast remaining districts the representatives of the only other recognized power on the field were prisoners in the hands of their despised subjects. It was the opinion at Manila during this anomalous period in our Philippine relations, and possibly in the United States as well, that such a state of affairs must breed something akin to anarchy.

I can state unreservedly, however, that Mr. Wilcox and I found the existing conditions to be much at variance with this opinion. During our absence from Manila we traveled more than 600 miles in a very comprehensive circuit through the northern part of the island of Luzon, traversing a characteristic and important district. In this way we visited seven provinces, of which some were under the immediate control of the central government at Malolos, while others were remotely situated, separated from each other and from the seat of government by natural divisions of land, and accessible only by lengthy and arduous travel. As a tribute to the efficiency of Aguinaldo's government and to the law-abiding character of his subjects, I offer the fact that Mr. Wilcox and I pursued our journey throughout in perfect security, and returned to Manila with only the most pleasing recollections of the quiet and orderly life which we found the natives to be leading under the new regime.

Some years ago, at an exposition held at Barcelona, Spain, a man and woman were exhibited as representative types of the inhabitants of Luzon. The man wore a loin cloth and the woman a scanty skirt. It was evident that they belonged to the lowest plane of savagery. I think no deeper wound was ever inflicted upon the pride of the real Filipino population than that caused by this exhibition, the knowledge of which seems to have spread throughout the island. The man and woman, while actually natives of Luzon, were captives from a tribe of wild Igorrotes of the hills; a tribe as hostile to the Filipinos as to the Spaniards themselves, and equally alien to both. It is doubtful to what extent such islanders are responsible for the low esteem in which the Filipino is held; his achievements certainly have never been well advertised, while his shortcomings have been heralded abroad. The actual, everyday Filipino is not as picturesque a creature as the Igorrote. The average human imagination has a remarkable affinity for the picturesque; and the commonplace citizen of Luzon is too often overlooked in the presence of the engrossing savage. If the observer's attention can be drawn to the former, however, much that is of interest will be found in his comparatively homely life.

In our journey we traveled first across the province of Nueva Iclia, by far the poorest and least interesting of all the provinces we visited. And yet even here we were greatly surprised by the intelligence and refinement of the inhabitants. While our entertainment at first was meager—for want of the wherewithal to provide a more generous one—we could nevertheless detect the same spirit of hospitality that found vent in elaborate manifestations in the richer towns which we visited later. We were particularly struck by the dignified demeanor of our hosts and by the graceful manner in which they extended to us their welcome. We had unlimited opportunities for conversation with the citizens of the towns, and we found everywhere a class that gave evidence of considerable culture and a certain amount of education. Their education included those branches only which were taught at the schools conducted by the priesthood at the capital towns of the provinces, and was of rather an impracticable nature. The Spanish language, Spanish history (appropriately garbled), church history, and the dead languages evidently formed its leading features.

The natives of this class seemed to have made the most of the opportunities offered them, and they had the subjects above mentioned completely at command. This enabled them to give a trend to their conversation that served at least to indicate their aspirations. On the other hand, their ignorance of modern history and politics, and particularly of current events, was astonishing. What they knew of the United States had been learned, like the Latin, from Spanish teachers, but was not equally reliable. Not only in the backward province of Nueva Iclia, but elsewhere throughout our journey, we found the same fund of misinformation on the subject. This related in great measure to the attitude of our Government toward the two races of people that have come under its jurisdiction with an inferior political status, namely, the negroes and the Indians. Of the condition of the negroes since the war, the Filipinos seem not to be aware. They express great curiosity on the subject of the Indian question, and have evidently been taught to see in the unhappy condition of that race the result of deliberate oppression, and a warning of what they may expect from our Government if they submit themselves to its legislation. Of ourselves, the citizens of the United States, they have been told that we possess neither patriotism, honor, religion, nor any other restraining or refining influence. A character has been given us consistent with the acts attributed to our nation. The natives are now undoubtedly becoming enlightened as to our true character, but it will probably be a long time before their last suspicions are removed. In the meanwhile we can not but hope that the good faith of our Government in any proposition it may make to the Filipino people will be accepted in advance. When it becomes a question of our fairness and our honest intentions toward them, the burden of proof must rest on us.

The towns of Nueva Iclia are small and unimposing. They are composed principally of "nipa" huts, built on "stilts" to evade the vapors that rise from the marshy ground.

The "stilts" and the frame of the hut are framed of bamboo poles, and an excellent floor is made from long, thin strips of the same wood laid together with their curved surfaces upward. The roof is thatched with grass, and the sides of the hut are formed of leaves of the "nipa" plant plaited together. Screens made of the same material serve in place of windows, sliding back and forth on bamboo guides in front of apertures cut in the walls. A short bamboo ladder gives entrance to the hut, which consists of two rooms, one forward of the other. The front room is raised a step higher than the rear one and is provided with as smooth a floor as possible, to be used principally for sleeping purposes. The back room contains the native stove, the only piece of furniture in the hut. This consists of a section of the trunk of a large tree hollowed out into the form of a bowl and lined with mortar. Many "nipa" huts are far more elaborate, but the one described is of the commonest type and frequently forms the home of a large family.

It will be noticed what an important part the bamboo forms in the construction of these huts. The value of the bamboo tree to the natives of all tropical countries has been too often dilated upon to bear further repetition; but I can not refrain from mentioning one use to which I have seen it put in this province. In the outskirts of one town through which we passed we noticed a number of huts whose owners, having made some attempt at cultivating the land in their immediate vicinity, had built a fence of bamboo to separate their fields from the road. There was nothing particularly remarkable about the fence, except that fences of any kind are not numerous in that country, but we were struck with astonishment on noticing a gate, through which a native had passed, close forcibly behind him without any effort on his part. We proceeded at once to investigate the phenomenon and discovered that the result which had so surprised us had been accomplished by the following unique arrangement: A long bamboo cord had been made fast to the gate and to a point near the top of a bamboo sapling growing in the yard, so that the cord was taut when the gate was shut. The gate opened outward, and could be passed through only by bringing sufficient pressure to bear to bend the sapling. When the pressure was released, the sapling would spring back to its erect position, closing the gate with a slam. With the means at hand a Yankee might well have been at a loss to devise a neater or more effective scheme.

The province of Nueva Iclia is low and marshy, and rice is almost the only agricultural product. At the time of our visit the entire population, both male and female, was engaged in the thrashing of rice, which, under their artistic manipulation, becomes a most picturesque proceeding. The implements used resemble, on a large scale, the pestle and mortar of a chemist. The mortar is replaced by a section of a log of hard wood, hollowed out into the shape of a bowl or trough; the pestle by a club about 4 feet long, with ends about 6 inches in diameter and the middle part scraped down to the shape of the hand and worn smooth by constant friction. The rice is thrown into the mortar as it is cut. The club, held in the middle, is raised well above the head in the right hand and cast vertically down upon the rice; caught up with the left hand as it rebounds, thrown again, and caught up with the right.

The workers make an interesting picture, half a dozen of them perhaps beating in the same mortar, their dark skins glistening in the sunlight, and every firm muscle working as their bodies move in the graceful action of their labor. These people are musical by nature, and there undoubtedly is harmony in this rhythmic beating of wood on wood. The sound penetrates to the most distant places and seems never to cease. It comes to you like the beating of a muffled drum, and brings before your mind the supple figures of the native girls casting their clubs in that graceful movement, down with the right hand, up with the left, down with the left hand, up with the right. I only once saw the workmen emphasize the musical element that characterizes this labor. On this occasion a party of four natives, two young men and two young women, were beating at the rice in one long trough, while an old man, sitting near with a musical instrument like a guitar, strummed the time.

In traveling from Nueva Iclia into the neighboring province of Nueva Vizcaya, and from there on through the greater part of the latter province, we passed through a rough and mountainous country. Our progress here was deplorably difficult, but the numerous views of magnificent scenery to which we were treated more than repaid us for our labors and hardships. I never before had suspected that Luzon Island contained within its borders such harmonies in landscape as it has been my good fortune to see. There are spots in the mountains of Nueva Vizcaya from which the aspect of the surrounding country overwhelms an observer with all the power of music and thrills his artistic sense into ecstasy. The deep-rooted prejudice that many men possess against all that is tropical, I think, would disappear in every case under the influence of the clear atmosphere and healthful soil of this beautiful province.

From Nueva Vizcaya for the next three weeks of travel we passed from one hospitable town to another, and enjoyed a round of novel entertainments. Our route now carried us through the valley of the Rio Grande Cagayan—probably the largest area of level country in Luzon Island.

With the exception of the region in the immediate vicinity of Manila, and of the narrow strip of land along the western coast, this valley, previous to the revolution, was the firmest and most ancient seat of Spanish authority on the island. Its towns throughout give evidence of the labor that has been expended on them. There are comparatively few "nipa" huts, and many ¹The author of this article, it should be stated, is a naval cadet. substantial frame buildings. Each town, moreover, has an elaborate church and convent, usually built of brick. Many of these churches date back into the last century, one which I remember particularly bearing the date 1780 as that of its completion.

Our entertainment in the different towns varied according to the facilities at hand; but in all cases music was a leading feature. In the absence of all accessories the village band would be called into the building in which we were received and would play tune after tune well on into the night, while we conversed at our ease with the village fathers. At the little village of Cordon, which has a population of only a few hundred, we passed one of the pleasantest evenings of our journey. In this instance four accomplished little girls gave the entertainment its particular charm. Soon after our arrival the entire village trooped into the large room of the public building that had been turned over to our party. The floor was cleared for a dance, and the band commenced with a waltz. After the waltz was finished two of the little girls danced a minuet and sang a very pretty dialogue accompaniment. The movement of the minuet was very slow and stately, and the little dancers went through it with charming effect.

As an encore when the minuet was finished, they sang a Spanish love song together. The ages of these little girls were 11 and 12, respectively, and they did not look at all older than their years. They were dressed as grown-up young ladies, however, with their hair elaborately arranged, and with long trains to their cotton gowns. When I asked their mother if this style of dress had been adopted as a masquerade, she said, "Oh, no. I expect both my little girls to be married very soon." After all, some of the customs of the Filipinos are rather picturesque.

After a short rest these girls and two others of about the same age danced the "contrabandista," using castanets. We enjoyed this dance very much. The dancers arranged themselves at starting in the form of a square, and frequently returned to that figure. Passing and repassing each other, twirling unexpectedly about, and posing for an instant, only to resume the rapid step, their tiny, erect figures moved with charming grace and quickness in time with the music, and their castanets kept up a lively accompaniment. When directions were needed, they were received from an old man, who occupied the position of dancing master in the village. A guitar and a flute supplied the only music for the dance. At times even this was dispensed with, and, in its stead, the dancing master sang a plaintive air in his native dialect. The music and dancing continued until we requested an opportunity to rest. On other occasions we have been shown many dances peculiar to the country, and have found that, while they are all graceful and interesting, none are in the least grotesque or barbaric.

The towns of Ilagan and Aparri, with their wealthy and pleasure-loving population, provided the most elaborate entertainment. Ilagan is the capital city of the tobacco-raising province of Isabella, and is situated near the head of navigation of the Rio Grande; Aparri is situated at its mouth, in the province of Cagayan, and is the only seaport of the valley. These towns are laid out in regular streets, and have many squares of substantial frame buildings. They have each a population of between ten and fifteen thousand. We spent three days at Ilagan, and I think that it was here that we were brought into closest touch with the Filipino character. The cultured class, which I have spoken of before, was strongly in evidence; and I think that before leaving we had discussed views with nearly every member of it. They all realized that they were passing through a crucial period in the history of their people, and young and old were eager to acquire all possible knowledge that might assist them to think clearly at this crisis. Their realization of the gravity of their position did not, however, rob their character of its natural gaiety, nor make them forget their duty as hosts. On the evening following our arrival a ball was given in our honor, which was attended by all the élite of the town. There were present about fifty young women and twice that number of men. All were dressed in European fashion. The girls were pleasant and intelligent; the men comported themselves in all respects like gentlemen. It was hard to realize that we were in the very heart of a country generally supposed to be given up to semisavages. At intervals between dances many songs were sung, usually by one or two of the guests, while all frequently joined in the choros. The national hymn was repeated several times with great enthusiasm. The ball lasted until nearly 3 o'clock in the morning, and broke up with good feeling at its height.

On the second evening we were invited to attend the theater, where two one-act Spanish plays were presented by the young society people of the town. The theater itself had been constructed by the villagers only a few weeks before. It was a large bamboo structure, one end of which was used as the village market, while the stage occupied the other end. The stage arrangements were good; curtain, side scenes, and footlights all en régio. In the performance of the play we saw our friends—these typical young Filipinos—in a light in which very few of our nation have had an opportunity to view them. They comported themselves with credit in a position where humor, intelligence, and artistic ability were the requisites of success.

During our stay at Ilagan we lived at the house of the mayor. This building was of great size, and was built of magnificent hard wood from the neighboring forest. One wing, containing a reception room and two bedrooms, was turned over to us. The reception room was very large, with a finely polished floor, and with windows along two sides. It contained a piano and a set of excellent bamboo furniture, including the most comfortable chairs and divans imaginable. There were two tall mirrors on the wall, and a number of old-fashioned pictures and framed paper flowers. In this room our friends gathered in the afternoon and took measures to make the time pass pleasantly for us. Whenever the conversation threatened to lose its animation, there was always some one at hand ready to accede to our host's request to play on the piano or to sing.

There was one form of hospitality which we met both at Ilagan and at Aparri that we would gladly have avoided. I still shudder when I recall the stupendous dinners that were spread before us night after night. The Filipinos pride themselves on their cookery, and it is indeed excellent. There could be no cause for complaint on that score. There is never any suspicion of the greasy and garlicky flavor to the food that characterizes a Spanish meal. Our host at Ilagan employed three cooks, each of whom in turn officiated at the preparation of one of the three dinners which we ate in that town. It is impossible to say which one deserved the palm. The shortest of the three dinners numbered fifteen courses and seemed interminable. In addition to fish, rice, chickens, and other domestic products of the country, there was served game of many sorts, including doves, snipes, deer, mountain buffalo, and boar. It was astonishing how many of the dishes were "conida del pais," and must be sampled by the visitors to secure a just conception of the Filipino talent in matters of the palate. We felt on leaving the table as if the horn of plenty had been thrust against our lips and its contents to the last crumb forced down our unwilling throats. I notice in my diary an entry made after returning from a dinner in one of the western provinces, where more moderation was displayed, which reads: "We had been in dread of encountering another such feast as those at Ilagan and Aparri, but found, to our great relief, that this meal lasted through only eight courses."

A Filipino dinner is usually served shortly after noon, and is followed by the siesta. The next meal comes about 9 o'clock, but is ordinarily preceded about three hours earlier by light refreshments of chocolate and sweetmeats. The native is very fond of the latter, which he prepares from coconut meat and sugar. His table is always set—at least when guests are present—with a tablecloth and napkins, and the customary supply of knives and forks. He is very temperate in his use of liquor. An alcoholic beverage is made from the sap of the "nipa" plant, and imported wines are served in the houses of the rich in the large towns. None of these are used to excess, however; and I have never seen an intoxicated Filipino.

Throughout the valley of the Rio Grande, as well as the province of Nueva Vizcaya, the wilder regions are inhabited by Igorrotes. These savages are not powerful enough to attack a town of any size, but they are a formidable menace to the smaller villages, and particularly to travelers. Unarmed individuals can not go with impunity from one town to another, but must travel in parties and with an armed escort. For this reason communication between the towns of these provinces is comparatively rare. Many provinces—such as Nueva Vizcaya—are shut off from their neighbors by ranges of mountains, whose passes lie in the Igorrote territory, and are eminently exposed to attack. At certain seasons of the year these attacks become especially numerous, on account, it is said, of the religious ceremonies observed by the Igorrotes. These ceremonies require the presence of human heads; and, accordingly, the whole tribe, moved by a deep feeling of piety, proceeds, with its armament of arrows and lances, to waylay whatever unhappy Filipinos may come within reach. One of these seasons of religious manifestation lasts nine days. It had become so notorious, and had cost so many lives, that a few years ago a law was passed prohibiting travel on certain roads between prescribed dates.

Many tribes of Igorrotes have been brought partly within the pale of civilization, principally in the western provinces. These tribes, in their semi-civilized state, are called Trugmanes. They live in primitive villages, and are presided over by leaders chosen from their own tribe. I have seen many of these people. The chiefs dress in Filipino garb, with cotton trousers, and a shirt falling outside of all. The chief is always seen carrying his staff of office—a gold-headed cane. The tribesmen wear only loin cloths. They are finely-built and very powerful men.

The dangers incident to travel have had much to do with the confusion of dialects that prevails on the island, and this confusion is consequently more marked in the eastern than in the western provinces. The educated class of Filipinos can speak two languages that are universal throughout the island in their own class; these are Spanish and Tagalog. The ignorant natives, on the other hand, have only their own provincial dialect. These dialects are so different one from another that they must be separately studied to be understood. Dictionaries of many of them have been made by the Jesuit priests. Through the servants of our party, we had at command five dialects in addition to the Spanish and Tagalog, yet in passing through one province we failed utterly to make ourselves understood by a native whom we accosted, although we plied him patiently with these seven languages.

There is but one individual who seems never to be daunted by the obstacles and dangers that separate him from the province toward which he sees fit to direct his footsteps. I refer to the Chinaman. In almost every village we visited we found at least one of that race; and in the larger towns there were many. They are the merchants of the island, presiding over every shop, and drawing money from every village. They are deeply hated by the Filipinos, and were the object of a strict emigration law under the administration of Aguinaldo's provisional government.

The steamer Oso, which took our party from Aparri, brought to that port a number of Chinese immigrants, destined in the greater part for Manila. The supercargo, however, desired to leave 50 of them at Aparri, and offered the governor of that place $50 per head for that number if he would permit them to land. His offer was promptly refused.

Our party proceeded on the Oso from Aparri around the northwestern corner of the island and landed on the coast near the northern end of the province of South Ilocos. From here we proceeded by land southward through the western provinces. During this part of our journey we were thrown into closer association than previously with the military element of the population, of which I hope to have an opportunity to speak further in a subsequent article.

The towns on the western coast are even larger than those on the Rio Grande. Vigan, the capital of South Ilocos, has a population of about 28,000, and Candón, farther to the southward, is not far behind this figure. The mayor of Candón was of the hustler type, and was evidently on the outlook for an opportunity to "boom" his town. On our departure he presented us with a written description of its exceptionally desirable location from a business standpoint. Every town gave evidence of the bitter fighting that had taken place between the natives and the Spaniards; many of the larger buildings, which had been used for defense, being riddled with bullet holes.

We no longer passed from town to town through unsettled stretches of country. The fields on both sides of the road were under cultivation and were dotted with laborers, while on the road itself there were always many travelers. The laborers in the fields worked in the shade of large screens of nipa leaves, which they carried with them from place to place.

Many of the travelers we passed were women. To give freedom to their limbs in walking, the skirts of their dresses were so arranged that the rear end could be drawn up between the knees and tucked into the belt in front, leaving the legs bare from the knees down. Their graceful carriage, which never failed to elicit our admiration, is due, to a great extent, I think, to their custom of carrying burdens upon their heads. This method of transportation has become a second nature to them, and is applied to articles of all descriptions. I have seen a native woman, with her hands swinging freely at her sides, walk briskly along with a pint bottle of gin balanced carelessly upon her head. On the other hand, their loads are often of great weight and towering height.

The Filipino maidens of high degree do not differ from their laboring sisters in the matter of graceful carriage. Many of them are pleasing in feature as well. Their education, however, seems to be responsible for a lack of vivacity, at least in their conversation with young men. They have evidently been taught to appear as cold and distant as possible in such society. On one point only they are always ready to meet you on terms of friendly equality; and that is when you make bold to suggest a smoke. They are always glad to accept a cigarette or small cigar, and if you are not prompt in offering one in all probability will produce one from their own supply and ask your permission to light it. This habit quickly ceases to attract your notice, except under unusual circumstances. At a town in Isabella my attention was drawn to a number of young girls returning from their first communion. They were clothed in dresses of pure white, and long veils hung chastely down below their shoulders.

I drank in the details of the picture with delight until I came to the thick haze that overhung it. Through the meshes of each veil a tube of tobacco was thrust, and every pair of dainty lips gave its continual contribution to the cloud of smoke that dwelt around the little group like a halo of universal sanction.

The men whom we met in the western provinces—our hosts at the different towns—possessed in general the same characteristics that we had observed in their countrymen farther to the eastward. We noticed, however, a marked difference between the inhabitants of the two districts in the matter of the prevailing religious sentiment. Throughout the valley of the Rio Grande the ordinary ceremonies of worship were almost entirely suspended for want of persons ordained to conduct them.

In Ilocos and Union, however, natives had been promptly placed in the sacred offices left vacant by the imprisonment of the Spanish priests; and at the time of our visit they were conducting all the services of the church. Freedom of thought marked the views of every Filipino that I have heard express himself on the subject of religion, and although I certainly have met devout Catholics among them, I judge that that church, on account of the abuses with which it has been associated on the island, has failed on the whole to secure an exclusive hold on the minds of the natives.

In speaking of the Filipino people, I have had reference throughout principally to one class of their society, which I have called the cultured class. If my observations of that class are just, however, I think that inferences can safely be drawn from them that extend their application over the entire Tagalog population. The great mass of this population has been kept in an unenlightened state by deliberate legislation which has effectually deprived them of every possible opportunity for advancement. Those who have acquired education have acquired it at an extravagant cost that has placed it hopelessly beyond the reach of all but the wealthy. There are few, if any, among that number, however, who, while possessing the price of a schooling, have neglected to apply it to that end. I can not see what better gauge we can obtain at present of the intelligence and ambition of the whole Filipino race than the progress that has been made by its favored members with the limited opportunities at their command. Throughout the island a thirst for knowledge is manifested and an extravagant respect for those who possess it.

I have seen a private native citizen in a town in the interior exercise a more powerful influence than all the native officials over the minds of the inhabitants, simply because he was known to have been educated in the best schools at Manila, and was regarded for that reason as a superior man. The heroes of these people are not heroes of war, but of science and invention. Without rival, the American who is best known by reputation in Luzon is Mr. Edison, and any native with the slightest pretension to education whom you may question on the subject will take delight in reciting a list of his achievements. The ruling Filipinos, during the existence of their provisional government, appreciated the necessity of providing public schools to be accessible to the poorest inhabitants. Had events so shaped themselves as to have provided an opportunity for carrying into effect the plans formed on this point, it seems possible that the mental plane of the entire population might have been raised gradually to a surprising height.

Out of respect to the statements of other people which the narrative of my experience may seem to contradict, I wish to say that I have found the native of the interior of Luzon an astonishingly different character from the one ordinarily met in Manila. Previous to my journey, I regarded those whom I had encountered in that city with great dislike, and after my return I was unable to overcome that feeling. They are not a fair sample of the race; and I can not expect anyone who has formed his judgment on the subject merely from observations of that type to express an opinion similar to mine, as recorded above.

The provisional government which assumed control of Filipino affairs in Luzon Island after the downfall of the Spanish power was a military one. The president of the so-called republic was general of the army and had at his command all the forces of the state, while military officers filled the high positions throughout the provinces. It was continually asserted by those in power that this disposition of the control of affairs had been resorted to merely to tide over the existing emergency and that it should continue only until the establishment of a permanent peace. As long as it remained in force, however, the concentration of power was absolute, and, moreover, no change of government could be contemplated without the cooperation of the controlling class. In the event of peace the population hoped to see the reins of government placed in their hands, but if opposition were offered, they certainly had not the power to seize them. The military class controlled the situation, and with it, in great measure, the destiny of the people. Accordingly as they were actuated by motives of patriotism or of personal ambition they could, if unmolested, inaugurate a just and liberal government or they could set upon the galled shoulders of their race a yoke as cruel as that they had just cast off.

It will never be known how they would have stood this crucial test. The peace they had anticipated is further from them now than ever, and it has been decided that a stronger power should relieve them of the responsibility of the vital decision. Yet they have not been deprived of importance. They still retain the official voice of their people, and it is with them that our nation is now at war. In view of their preeminent position in Luzon affairs, past, present, and future, some interest must attach to every observation of their character, especially to such as tend to show to what extent they represent the feelings and aspirations of the great mass of the Filipino population, and in what measure they have at heart the truest interests of their race.

The leaders of the military element have been drawn, almost without exception, from the younger generation of that enlightened class of Filipinos, of which I have spoken in a previous article as existing everywhere throughout Luzon Island. They possess, of course, many qualities in common with their older kinsfolk, in whose charge they have been reared; and yet they differ from them so significantly on many points as to deserve particular attention. The characters of men are not set to such rigid lines as to remain unchanged by the sudden attainment of authority, and the Filipino, like his brother of every other land, assumes a new demeanor with his uniform of office.

Throughout the period of my association with both classes I found the distinction apparent between civilians and military officers. Had Mr. Wilcox and I been provided for our journey with the customary credentials required of travelers in that country many of the evidences of this difference which came to our notice would have been missing. Starting without passports, however (in fact, after having been refused them by Aguinaldo), our status was such as to invite all possible arrogance on the part of the officials, while throwing the most favorable light upon the open hospitality of the citizens. Under the circumstances I am inclined to think that there was a surprising lack of arrogance in the attitude which the officials assumed toward us. Yet there was a dignity in their bearing, and in some cases a coldness, caused by their suspicions of the motive of our journey, which were entirely lacking in their civilian countrymen. "Armor is heavy, but it is a proud burden, and a man standeth straight in it." So these young Filipinos, vested with the authority of their office and supporting the responsibility of their duty toward the state, assumed a manner and more independent bearing than the genial and conciliatory one of the older men.

In the opposition which they frequently offered to our plans we found much that was inconvenient, but nothing that was unreasonable from their point of view. We found them hard to cajole, or to "bluff," or to move by any means other than a fair and open statement which they could clearly understand. Before the end of the journey we came to regard the military Filipino as the only stumbling block to our progress. And yet, in spite of the annoyance he caused us and of the frequent changes in our itinerary induced by his persistent opposition, we learned to admire him far beyond his simpler and more amiable countrymen.

It could easily be seen that we did not control a monopoly of the admiration expended on this subject. The older men looked with manifest pride on the evidences of the firm purpose and quick decision of their sons and nephews, even while endeavoring, in many instances, to mollify the rigor of their methods; and the young officers themselves evinced great complacency when they dwelt upon the subject of their past achievements in the field and of the efficiency of their subsequent administration of affairs. The experience through which they had passed had imparted to their character a respect for their own ability and confidence in their own resources that is woefully lacking in the untried Filipino.

Prior to my departure from Manila I had witnessed many examples of this deficiency in the national character, and had considered them of considerable significance. I remember on one occasion having observed a native coachman whose carriage had been overturned by a collision stand helplessly in the road regarding the wreck with an expression of utter despair, while he wrung his hands together and repeated in tones of the most agonized self-pity the expression, "Pobre Filipino! Pobre Filipino!" He was still in this attitude when an American soldier near by took the matter in hand, and in a very short time had the horse on his feet, the carriage right side up, and the harness readjusted. I thought at the time that if the Filipino race possessed no more stamina than that displayed by this coachman and no more readiness and resource to assist them in confronting unforeseen situations they would be indeed fortunate to have always at hand the ready support of a stronger power.

I was not aware of the hardening effect upon the national character of the events even then occurring, and did not guess that the identical qualities whose absence I had noticed were being rapidly inculcated by the first phases of that experience to whose success I had considered their presence indispensable.

Other qualities than these, moreover, are awakening from a dormant state. Prior to the advent of the great incentive in his life that came with the revolution, the native displayed, in all his undertakings, but little endurance and less perseverance. His existence was so ordered that no permanent good could come to him or to his family from even the most continued endeavor, and he labored, therefore, for some temporary emolument only. He never had at stake a prize really worth the winning, and there was nothing within his horizon that appealed to him as deserving of as much attention as his own physical comfort.

It was this that he considered first when set to any task, and he refused always to work under a strain. He recognized the limit to his powers within which he could work at ease, and, if forced beyond this limit, he promptly "threw up the sponge." In our party, at one time, among the number of our packmen were several old natives whom we had picked up at a little inland town. They belonged to the "ante-bellum" type of Filipino, and seemed scarcely cognizant of recent events. One day, toward nightfall, noticing that one of these packmen was missing, we went back over the trail to ascertain what had become of him. He was found about 5 miles in the rear resting by the roadside, the picture of ease and indifference. In answer to our indignant inquiries, he merely replied that he had felt tired and had stopped to rest. When ordered to proceed, and threatened with punishment if he loitered, he made the distance to camp in good time. It had not been a case of exhaustion or of physical inability, but merely of an inconvenient weariness and an entire absence of grit. Such was the old, purposeless, unawakened Filipino, and he bears a marked contrast to the vigorous and enthusiastic young insurgent soldier, whose every energy is at the service of the cause he has espoused, and who has endured every hardship and braved every danger in his support.

We heard many tales, and were in a position to authenticate them to a great extent, of deeds that told in glowing terms of the endurance and courage the Filipinos could display when impelled by a sufficient motive. The revolution in Luzon Island was by no means a simultaneous uprising of the population, and in its early stages the force that opposed the Spanish power was not overwhelming in its numbers. In the provinces far in the interior particularly the earlier encounters found the advantage in the hands of the Spaniards, whose opponents were but small bands of the most daring and desperate natives of the vicinity, poorly armed and entirely without organization or discipline. Yet these pioneers of rebellion did win brilliant and surprising victories, and, by their success, encouraged their more timid neighbors to join their fortunes to the cause.

In a district embracing the capital city of Nueva Vizcaya, a band of 20 Filipinos were for several days the only natives in open rebellion, and they conducted hostilities unaided against a force of Spaniards of ten times their number. The Spanish commander, alarmed at the signs of discontent among the population, undertook to proceed with his troops to a neighboring town possessing stronger defenses. He was ambushed three separate times on the march by the little band of rebels, and suffered a large loss. Recruits immediately swelled the ranks of the insurgents, and before the week was out the entire province was in their hands. The leader of the gallant little band of patriots, Lieutenant Navarro, is one of the very few officers whom I have met who represent the more ignorant class of the population. He could not speak Spanish, nor read nor write his own language, and on that account, at the time of our visit, had not risen above the rank of lieutenant.

In many of the provinces the revolution received its start from detachments of Aguinaldo's expeditionary forces, which were sent across the island from the more populous districts on the western coast. These detachments—in some cases mere squads—performed most remarkable service.

They traveled through the wildest parts of the island to reach their destination, and, arriving there, were forced to depend for the support of the natives, upon the success of their own first operations against the superior force of the enemy. Of these expeditions, one of the most noteworthy was that sent from North Ilocos overland to Cagayan. The mountains lying between these provinces are generally considered impassable on account of the absence of beaten paths and of the presence of one of the most formidable tribes of Igorrotes on the island. The expeditionary force, however—about forty strong—succeeded in accomplishing the journey after five days of constant effort and hardships, and arrived at Aparri in an exhausted condition, but with undaunted spirit.

The Filipinos have a national weapon with which they claim to have won their independence from Spain. This is the bola or native knife. It is used in times of peace for all conceivable purposes, and through constant practice is handled with the utmost dexterity. It is as much a part of the Filipino of the provinces as a jackknife was of the old-time sailor. When traveling even for very short distances, or when working where the bola is likely to be of service, the native carries it slung on his belt and shoved around behind him, so as not to interfere with his movements. It has no definitely fixed size or shape, but the commonest type applied to the purposes of war is about 2½ feet long, including the handle, and has a broad, thick blade, with the weight and edge of a guillotine. The effect of such a weapon in hands thoroughly trained in its use can be imagined. At the time of our journey the Filipinos had absolute confidence in it, and claimed that no other weapon could withstand it. When wielded in the mad fury of a charge, its effects were certainly terrible. Not only were heads shorn off at a stroke, but bodies were severed through the trunk from shoulder to hip; and rifles held in a position of defense were cut through the barrels and the skulls beneath were split down to the chin. The native officers relied almost entirely upon these "bola charges" for the defeat of their Spanish foes. When the call to charge was sounded, the entire force, including the highest officers, discarded all other weapons and charged the enemy, bola in hand.

After the successful termination of the rebellion, all the insurgent officers provided themselves with sabers and revolvers from the supply captured from the Spaniards, and wore them with great satisfaction. As far as concerned their use in warfare, however, they regarded them with contempt, and asserted the superiority of the bola. I could not but admit that even our own soldiers would have but little chance in a hand-to-hand encounter, without firearms, with an equal number of natives armed with their favorite weapon; but I was also well aware that with revolvers they could defeat a large attacking party. I argued the point unavailingly with Aguinaldo's officers, however, and only succeeded in tainting my own reputation for veracity by relating the following incident in support of my assertions:

An American soldier on guard duty in Manila was suddenly attacked and struck to the ground by a Filipino desperado, who then took to his heels. The soldier, without attempting to rise, drew his revolver and emptied the chambers at the fleeing figure. When the native's body was examined all the bullets expended were accounted for; one had shattered his ankle, another was imbedded in his thigh, three were responsible for wounds in the trunk, and the sixth had pierced his skull. This was an actual occurrence, and I believe that the Filipino soldiery could now be easily convinced of its truth when supported by other evidences of good marksmanship that have undoubtedly come to their notice. The reason for their original incredulity could easily be understood, however, after an examination of the revolvers with which they were provided. These were miserable imitations of the Smith & Wesson revolver, and bore on the back of the barrel the name of the makers, garbled into "Smit & Wilson." No part of their action was perfected; the cartridge frequently failed to come in line with the hammer, and 50 per cent is a fair estimate of the misfires.

At the time of our journey the patriotic enthusiasm of the population was everywhere at its height. The boast of every inhabitant was the national army whose organization was then being rapidly perfected. Commissions were eagerly sought by the young men of the higher class, and there were more volunteers for service in the ranks than could be armed or uniformed.

It was universally asserted that every preparation should be made to defend the newly won independence of the island against all foreign aggression. The older Filipinos, especially those of wealth and influence, declared their desire to give every support in their power to the cause, and were as much a part of the warlike movement as those who actually took up arms. The great majority of the latter, both officers and enlisted men, were extremely young. I have met a brigadier-general of 21 years of age, many captains of 18, and lieutenants of 15 and 16. Captain Natioidad, a particularly young officer of that rank and a member of a prominent Luzon family, explained that it was the aim of his government to rest its defense in the field in the hands of those of its supporters who were at that age that is most forcibly swayed by the love of military glory. For the desperate encounters that might await its army in the future it desired that sort of valor of which discretion is not the better part.

That the civil power should be placed in the same hands was a dangerous experiment, but at the same time a necessary one. The first object of the Filipinos had been to win their independence; the next was to defend it. For both these purposes they had need of their best fighting material, and the selection was made accordingly. The result proved more fortunate than there had been any reason to hope. While exercising absolute authority throughout the island and governing entirely by military law, the leaders of the army appeared, nevertheless, to endeavor to mete out justice to all classes alike. They continued, moreover, to assert their intention to relinquish their temporary power when the establishment of a permanent peace should make such a step possible, and gave most encouraging proofs of the good faith with which they spoke.

A tendency was apparent in many individual instances to treat the entire civilian population with contempt, and the lower element of it with oppression and abuse. In one or two districts through which we passed this spirit was particularly marked, but it was not countenanced as a rule, and had been made the subject of a special order from the authorities at Malolos. On the whole, as far as I could judge, the tendency was upward. The young officers displayed an earnest desire to improve their minds for the benefit of the State, and seemed to be impelled by the ambition to prove themselves worthy of the trust that had been confided in them.

I passed one evening about the middle of last November in the "Comandancia" at San Fernando, in the province of Union, where were quartered over forty officers belonging either to companies stationed at the town or to the staff of General Fija, the commander of the northwestern district. Our conversation was confined, as usual, to a great extent to professional subjects; but I remember the visit particularly on account of the presence of a number of Spanish text-books on infantry tactics which were distributed among the officers and were evidently in almost constant service. * * * How many of these eager young students of the rudiments of military science have since learned the final lesson of war?

IN THE HEART OF LUZON.

[By Paymaster W. B. Wilcox, United States Navy.]

No doubt it is a misfortune that the Filipino does not understand American valor, and I dare say it is equally unpleasant that the average American does not know the true character of the natives of the Philippine Islands. Diplomacy could do much, and justice as we claim for ourselves could do more.

I was fortunate in being allowed by Admiral Dewey to make a long journey through the island of Luzon; in fact, I covered the whole northern portion from Manila to Aparri with the then Naval Cadet Sargent, and in no country have I been treated with more kindly hospitality.

We started with eight horses and five servants and came to Bayambang, where we spent Sunday at the house of Mr. Clark, an Englishman, and were entertained in a thoroughly English country gentleman's way. The next day we limbered up and made the first stage to Rosales and pitched our tents on the bank of the Rio Aritao. That evening the presidente local sent a man to invite us to the convento, but I said we were settled for the night, our horses tethered, and prepared to remain until next morning. We rode into this town and were received with the band playing and given a most welcome reception. Soon after we saddled up and proceeded to the next stage. The towns passed were all in gain attire, having known from couriers that we were coming. Nothing occurred until the journey from San Jose to Puncan was undertaken, and that was almost the hardest of the whole trip. Horses were of no use, we engaged bagadores to carry our outfit, and I must say if we could have traveled as fast as these men, with packs of nearly 70 pounds each, in the driving rain, we would have reached Puncan early in the afternoon. But horses can not compete with muscular men in the long run. Arriving at the river Carranglan, swollen from heavy rains, our men said it was impossible to cross; but Mr. Sargent plunged his horse into the raging stream and reached the other bank. The natives followed. I was left as the only one. We had brought several hundred fathoms of small rope for just such purposes, and I suggested tying this to a tree and bringing the end to me to tie around my waist, and thus swim over the stream. The current was running 6 miles an hour. The plan was partly carried out, but in bringing the rope across the line parted, and Sargent, who had the end, went under the stream and we never expected to see him again. Finally I got over. In all towns the best the Filipinos had was given us and not a cent would be accepted in payment.

From Puncan the next important stop was at the river Carranglan, which was roaring so hard it made it impossible to cross at night, and we pitched our tents on the bank. The major-domo of the party said there were numerous caymans (alligators) and they would crawl up and eat us and our horses some time during the night. So he kept firing guns and was awake all night. He could imagine the 30-foot alligator walking away with a horse and a tent and all contents, though we had about forty men all told and many guns.

Passing over much that occurred, we reached the foot of the Carabell Mountains, which began the hardest of all the journey.

After many weary hours I, who was carrying 220 pounds, finally reached the summit at the altitude of 3,000 feet.

On reaching Aritao the presidente local put us up in an old convent and his hand serenaded us at night, and in the morning everywhere the same generous kindness was shown. Our next stop was at Bambang, where the nephew of Aguinaldo met us some distance out of town, guns firing and convent bells ringing. In the evening a fine orchestra was stationed in the hall and lulled two sleepy Americans to rest in sweetest strains, for almost all Filipinos can play some sort of music. In leaving this spot we were accompanied by soldiers as usual, and by Aguinaldo himself, to Bayambang, capital of the province of Nueva Vizcaya. I was met at the bank of the river by the presidente local, and we rode into town amid flags flying and the band playing and were taken to the municipal building. In this far-away town of Luzon I met the most intelligent man, a lawyer by profession, an educated man, and his theory of the future of his country appealed to me as quite the proper solution; what he wanted was free public schools in every village and town, where English would be taught and where the children would soon have wiped out from their curriculum all the Spanish form of government and all the Spanish customs that have brought devastation to their homes; as prostituting all the virtues of a people who want their homes protected and to live in quietness and peace where their daily earnings will not be fleeced from them by the ingenious methods only known to the hidalgo Español and the man whom he employs for purpose of the basest robbery.

From this place our next important stop was Iligan, the capital of the province of Isabela, where millions of dollars come in annually to purchase the product of tobacco which is grown in this, perhaps the most fertile province in the whole of Luzon.

On our first night in this island capital we were given a dance at which fifty well-dressed young ladies and the same number of gentlemen attended. I was sorry, indeed, I had not my dress suit. One young lady with whom I danced had a splendid gown of rare silk handsomely embroidered, and she danced, I confess, better than I; she was a fine player on the piano and sang many songs for us. The next night a theater was given, and the players were quite as good as in some shows in a more pretentious country.

From Aparri we took steamer to the west coast, and then by horse and various other means made our way to Dagupan and Manila, after a month and a half of most delightful experiences.

The resources of the country can hardly be estimated, but it must have peace and, still more important, transportation, railroads, and means of getting the product of the soil to ready market.

Public schools will do more for the civilization of the island of Luzon than bayonets, and in a few years the Filipino children, who are now most anxious to learn the English language, will be the producers of shiploads of products of the most fertile soil in a tropical latitude and make an empire in the Orient of which not only ourselves but the Filipino will be justly proud.

We must first destroy all vestige of the Spanish ideas and have one language for all the island. As it is now a man of one province can not understand the language of his neighbor, living across the line within a few hundred yards.

When the Filipino can see the benefit of honorable treatment and that justice will be dispensed without favor, he will come into the fold and be a citizen not to be ashamed of.

IN AGUINALDO'S REALM.

[By Ensign L. R. Sargent, United States Navy.]

In the early part of October, 1900, Paymaster Wilcox, United States Navy, and I obtained from Admiral Dewey leave of absence from our duties on board the U. S. S. Monadnock for the purpose of making a tour of observation through the northern part of the island of Luzon. Our original plans were of a very indefinite nature, being merely to proceed as far to the northward as the character of the country and the attitude of the natives would permit and to return only when forced to do so. The existing ignorance of the conditions prevailing in the interior gave rise to a very exaggerated idea of the difficulties of such a journey.

Had it been suggested at any time prior to our departure that we could cover the ground as completely as we eventually succeeded in doing, we should have scouted the idea as preposterous. Suggestions of this nature were, however, conspicuous by their absence, while prophecies of an early failure and an ignominious return were numerous. As the few days that we could devote to our preparations passed and we found ourselves coming face to face with the difficulties of our undertaking, these gloomy prophecies certainly forced an echo from our own hearts.

The first material obstacle that we encountered was the refusal of Aguinaldo to provide us with passports. These, we had reason to believe, were sine qua non of peaceful travel through the island, officers of our Army whose duties carried them beyond our own lines having been repeatedly turned back for want of them. Mr. Wilcox, with the outfit, servants, and horses, proceeded to Bayambang, a town near the northern terminus of the railroad, where he was entertained by Mr. Donald Clark, a hospitable Englishman, while I spent two days at Malolos petitioning Aguinaldo for a more favorable answer. The Filipino president remained firm, however. He expressed great friendliness, and readily gave his consent to our journey, refusing only to provide written passports, without which we should be, of course, as defenseless against the opposition of his officers as the most unwarranted trespassers. It was evident that he preferred that we should remain at home. When I joined Mr. Wilcox at Bayambang we talked the matter over and came to the conclusion that we held anything but a strong hand. We decided, therefore, to adopt that method of play by which alone it is possible to win on a poor one. Leaving Bayambang at daybreak next morning, we accordingly proceeded by the main traveled road on the first stage of our journey.

This road led us almost due east through the low and marshy province of Nueva Ecija. The rainy season at this time was at its height, and for seven days we scarcely saw the sun. Almost from the start we found the mud so deep that it was impossible to ride the horses through it. Leading them by their bridles, we struggled on on foot until men and beasts were exhausted, covering in this way only 10 or 12 miles a day. Even with the sun covered the heat was excessive, and members of the party were frequently prostrated by that and the exertion combined. Two of our servants proved too old to stand the strain and were sent back, a fate which befell two of our horses also. We soon recruited our party to its original strength, however. Pack horses were quickly abandoned in favor of natives, who accompanied us from town to town, carrying our luggage divided among them on their backs. For the tremendous labor which these men performed they considered 10 cents a day ample pay. This amount seems still more ridiculously small when you consider that the men were usually discharged a full day's travel distance from their homes. As we proceeded the road grew worse, until finally at San José it dwindled to a soggy bridge path. Just beyond San José the province of Nueva Ecija joins that of Nueva Vizcaya, the division between them being marked by a range of mountains. The natives along the route had informed us that this range was impassable, even to natives, during that season of the year, and this statement received decided indorsement at San José. It was not with any great hope of success, therefore, but with a determination to carry the attempt as far as possible that we set out from San José. We had difficulty in obtaining men for this stage of the journey, but succeeded finally, by offering considerable inducements, in engaging ten men and a guide. We found that the difficulties in this case had been very little exaggerated. Many times our progress seemed effectually checked. The continuous rains of the past week had swollen every one of the innumerable mountain streams until its passage had become a problem. This stage of not over 30 miles as the crow flies occupied three days of ten working hours each. The trail was extremely intricate. Our guide was a native of the district and had often made the journey (though never at that season of the year), yet he lost the way three times, and had great difficulty in finding it again. Here, for the first time, we heard fear expressed by members of our party of an attack by the Igorrotes, or savages of the hills; a possibility which afterwards came to form an important part in all our calculations. We also became acquainted with the native terror of the alligators which inhabit the streams, and in a lower degree, of the serpents occasionally met in the forest.

Upon reaching the town of Carranglan, on the other side of the mountains in the province of Nueva Vizcaya, we took a day to dry our outfit and to recuperate. Our diet during the past three days had been cold boiled rice and hard-tack, and our rest at night had been on the wet ground with practically no protection from the violent rain. In that climate hardships can not be endured with impunity, and every man of the party, native as well as American, showed the effect of this treatment. Fortunately, however, the traveling from this point on became easier, and we were able, even in our somewhat weakened condition, to travel at a more rapid pace than previously. Our arrival at Carranglan marked the end of one distinct stage of our journey, and our departure therefrom marked the beginning of a second.

Up to this time the obstacles encountered had been natural ones—bad roads and swollen rivers. The province of Nueva Ecija is an important one from a military standpoint. Its towns at that time were garrisoned by small squads of soldiers, commanded by noncommissioned officers, and we met no one who felt it incumbent upon himself to make any determined opposition to our progress, although many expressed surprise at our lack of the customary passports. From Carranglan on through the province of Nueva Vizcaya we met with more varying fortunes, experiencing the coldest suspicion as well as the most demonstrative hospitality, being checked at one town by the ringing of church bells and the music of the band and at the next by the critical cross-questioning of the local authorities. At Bayombong, the capital of the province, we were stopped for several hours by the military officer stationed there. After ridiculing the whole idea of passports, and giving this officer some good advice on the manner of conducting a republican form of government, we succeeded in obtaining his permission to proceed.

At an elevation of four or five hundred meters above the sea level, with firm roads and a cordial sun, traveling became the greatest of pleasures. No matter what the attitude of the military officers in the different towns might be, we were invariably made welcome by the citizens.

The larger towns at which we spent the night gave balls in our honor, while the smaller ones, with the village band and native dancing, gave what entertainment they could improvise—often the most enjoyable. While the towns of this province are larger and more pretentious than those of Nueva Ecija, they are situated farther apart and are more completely isolated one from another. The forests between are inhabited by tribes of Igorrotes, who are a constant menace to travelers. On one road over which we passed a party of 20 Filipinos had been murdered to a man only a few days before our arrival. The character of the country offers every opportunity for such savage attack, the trail frequently leading through thick forests or plains of rank grass meeting overhead. Although we considered our party strong enough for its own protection, we were usually provided with an escort of Filipino soldiers.

Frequently we were joined by natives who had been awaiting an opportunity to go from one town to another in safety, bringing the number of our party at one time up to forty-seven. Often from the high points on the road we could see the smoke of at least one Igorrote camp fire, frequently within a few miles of a large Filipino town. There can hardly be any direct method of attack against these savages, since they build no villages and have a vast wilderness for refuge; but at the time of our visit the Filipinos had already begun to build small forts at the points most frequently subject to their menaces—a step in advance of any the Spaniards had taken.

At the town of Carig, near the frontier of the province of Isabella, we encountered Major Villa, the military governor of the province, who had been sent from his capital city by his superior officer, Colonel Tirona, the commander of the northeastern military district, to demand our passports, and, if we did not have them, to examine into the purpose of our expedition. In carrying out his orders this officer kept us for seven days quartered in a deserted convent in this miserable village. At the end of that time, by the permission of Colonel Tirona, with whom we had succeeded in opening direct communication, we were allowed to proceed.

A few miles from Carig we reached the Rio Grande de Cagayan, down which we descended in canoes to its mouth. We spent two days at Iligan, the capital of the province of Isabella, and three at Aparri, the only seaport on the northern coast of the island, towns having a population of about 15,000 each. We were extremely well entertained. At Iligan a large ball was given in our honor, and two Spanish operas were presented by the young people of the town. From this performance we received most pleasing proof of the humor, intelligence, and refinement of our entertainers.

At the towns we had previously visited we had occasionally seen numerous Spanish prisoners, all of whom were apparently enjoying full liberty within the limits of the town. At Iligan we saw Spanish soldiers and ex-civil officials in the same status; but the priests had been differently dealt with; they were too dangerous to be left at large, we were told, and were accordingly confined in a convent. We saw them one morning, to the number of 84, lined up in the street in charge of a squad of Filipino soldiers.

At Aparri I witnessed a ceremony which, at the time, I considered pregnant with significance, and I have seen no reason since for changing my opinion. During our entire journey we had noticed the existence of a distinct civil and military government. The civil government was simple and efficient, consisting of four officials for each province and four for each town. The military government consisted of an officer in command of a military district, having under his orders one officer as military governor of each province and one as governor of each important town. The military government was the dominant one. We remarked on this condition several times, and were told that it would last only during a state of war. At Aparri we received proof of the sincerity of this statement. Word had been received from Hongkong that our commissioners at Paris, negotiating the terms of the treaty of peace, had plainly indicated that it was their intention not to return the islands to Spain. Relieved from their great apprehension of this action, the Filipino population began at once to see rosy visions of peace descending on their war-torn country. Steps were immediately taken to adjust existing conditions to the new state of things. Colonel Tirona, the governor of the northeastern military district, took the lead by relinquishing the control of affairs in the provinces comprised in his district in favor of a civil official chosen by the people. I was present at the impressive ceremony which solemnized this change in the province of Cagayan. The ceremony took place in the cathedral at Aparri and was attended by all the local officials of the towns of the province, as well as by any military officers that could be spared from their duties. Colonel Tirona placed the usual insignia of office—a gold-headed cane—in the hands of the governor-elect at the close of a short speech, in which he said that now that a state of peace seemed probable he desired to divest himself of the unusual authority that it had been necessary for him temporarily to exercise and to assume his proper position as a servant—not a ruler—of the people. The governor, in reply, expressed his thanks to the Colonel and to all of the expeditionary forces for the incalculable service they had rendered the people of the province in freeing them from Spanish rule and declared the purpose of the people to expend the last drop of their blood, if necessary, in defending the liberty thus gained against the encroachments of any nation whatsoever. The governor then took the oath of office, being followed in turn by each of the three other provincial officials, the heads of the departments of justice, revenue, and the police. It was the Colonel's intention to have a similar ceremony performed in each of the other provinces under his control. Had the Filipino government been allowed to work out its own salvation, this movement could hardly have failed to become historical.

At Aparri we saw proof also of the extent of Aguinaldo's authority. Four natives had been tried for robbery and attempted murder and had been sentenced to death. At the time of our visit they were awaiting the arrival from Malolos of the ratification of their sentence by the president.

Everywhere we traveled the greatest loyalty toward Aguinaldo was expressed. Now, at the time of his reverses, it is possible, though I am far from convinced, that he represents but one element of his people; then, in his prosperity, he certainly represented them all—at least in northern Luzon. At that time the enthusiasm of the people was tuned to the highest pitch. In every village every man was training in arms. Companies were formed of boys from 8 years of age upward. Wooden guns were furnished them, and they were drilled systematically every day. The women also were imbued with the spirit. Many and many a time have the people of a village gathered in the large room of the "presidencia," where the paymaster and I were quartered, and put their whole hearts into the songs in which their patriotism found vent. Of these songs the national hymn was the favorite, and no one within hearing ever failed to join in the chorus:

Del sueño de tres Siglos
Hermanos despertad!
Gritando, "Fuera España!
Viva la libertad!"

(From your sleep of three centuries
Brothers awake!
Crying, "Away with Spain!
Live liberty!")

After a delay of three days we were fortunate enough to catch a small coasting steamer, which took us around the northern end of the island and landed us on the western coast at the northern end of the province of South Ilocos. From here we proceeded toward Manila. We wished to visit the interior provinces on this side of the island, but were prevented by the authorities. Already the hope was fading that freedom from Spain meant freedom of government. The feeling toward Americans was changing, and we saw its effect in the colder manner of the people and in their evident desire to hustle us along by the most direct road to Manila.

Although the spirit was evidently missing, we were nominally treated with every distinction. A mounted escort was furnished us, which rode ahead with guidons to clear the road. The towns in these western coast provinces are larger and more numerous than those in the valley of the Rio Grande. The military element is much more in evidence, as well as the native religious element, which has succeeded the Spanish priests. At Vigan, the capital of South Ilocos, we dined with twenty-eight military officers, and at San Fernando, the capital of Union, with forty. All of these officers are very young, a large proportion being minors. General Tino, commanding the northeastern military district, is just 21. Captain Natividad, the commander of three important towns with an aggregate population of over 40,000, is 18 years old, while his younger brother, who bears a commission as lieutenant, is but 16. His elder brother, with the rank of lieutenant-general, was next in command to Aguinaldo at the age of 28 when he fell in action in the revolution of 1896.

In the latter part of November Paymaster Wilcox and I returned to Manila. A few minutes after our arrival I attempted to engage the services of a Filipino coachman, and found him stubborn and insolent almost beyond belief. I thought of the courteous gentleman and respectful servant I had met in the interior and wondered where among them I should class this brute. Yet they are all three one; and together they make up the Filipino. Good treatment makes of him the respectful servant, education makes of him a gentleman that no man need be ashamed to greet; but anything that he interprets as injustice arouses something in his nature that makes of him a stubborn and intractable brute. If all were known about the Filipino, public sentiment toward him, while it might not be changed, would at least be softened. There are qualities in him too fine to be wantonly destroyed. If the brute must be broken, let us hope that the respectful servant and the gentleman will be encouraged.

REPORT OF TOUR THROUGH ISLAND OF LUZON.

MANILA, P. I., November 23, 1898.

SIR: In obedience to your order, we herewith submit a report of the tour of observation of the northern part of the island of Luzon, undertaken by your authority during a leave of absence beginning October 6, 1898.

1. Paymaster W. B. Wilcox was detained by duty on board the U. S. S. Monadnock until October 6. Naval Cadet L. H. Sargent leaving on the 5th. Preparations for the journey were immediately begun, and were completed by the evening of October 7. From the experience of certain American officers we had learned that it was necessary, in order to pass through the lines of the Philippine forces, to obtain permission from their leader, Señor Emilio Aguinaldo. To comply with this form, Naval Cadet Sargent visited Aguinaldo at his official residence in the town of Malolos. Leaving Manila by train at noon, October 7, he arrived at his destination shortly after 2 o'clock. Señor Aguinaldo at this time was attending a meeting of the Philippine cabinet, and our request for passports through his troops in the northern provinces was taken to him by his aid-de-camp, Señor C. C. Zealcita. In making this request we stated our rank as naval officers and the object of our proposed journey as a desire to acquire information with regard to this country, at present almost unknown to Americans. Señor Aguinaldo sent out word by his aid-de-camp that he was too busily engaged that day to provide the passes, and, furthermore, that a member of our party coming later to request them should be expected to have a letter from either Admiral Dewey, General Otis, or General MacArthur.

2. Naval Cadet Sargent returned to Manila by the evening train. The flagship Olympia being at Cavite, to have requested a letter from the commander in chief would have caused a delay of at least one day. Both members of our party being acquainted with General MacArthur, the circumstances were explained to him and a letter obtained on the evening of the 1st to Malolos. This letter was addressed "to whom it may concern," and was a mere statement that the officers presenting it wished to visit the northern provinces of the island and desired passports through the Philippine forces. It gave the itinerary of the proposed journey. The next morning, October 8, we also obtained from Consul-General Williams a personal letter to Señor Aguinaldo, requesting that passports be provided us.

3. At noon of this day, October 8, we left Manila by train with five servants, eight horses, and between three and four hundred pounds of baggage, including a camp outfit, two rifles, and a shotgun, with ammunition. Paymaster Wilcox, in charge of the expedition, went on to Bayambang that night, while Naval Cadet Sargent left the train at Malolos to present our letters to Señor Aguinaldo. As on the day before, our request was taken in by Señor Zealcita. After a delay of about two hours Señor Aguinaldo's answer was brought out. It was to the effect that he declined to assume the responsibility of providing us with passports to travel in the provinces we wished to visit. Rumors had just been received of an insurrection, instigated by a Spanish bishop, in the northern provinces, on the western coast, and he could not tell how far an insurrection thus started might spread. While his authority was thus menaced he refused to provide us with papers that would make him responsible for our safety, while they might not protect us from ill-treatment. He also refused a second request to furnish us passports specifically addressed to those soldiers only that were loyal to his command and stating that we traveled at our own risk. Through his aid-de-camp, however, he gave us the repeated and positive assurance that we were free to prosecute our journey without passes from him, and that we should encounter no opposition from his forces. This oral promise was the only substitute that we were able to obtain for the formal passports that it has been the custom of the country heretofore to demand of every traveler.

4. Naval Cadet Sargent left Malolos by the first train next morning, October 9, and joined Paymaster Wilcox at Bayambang. At this town we remained at the house of Mr. Donald Clark, an Englishman, superintendent of a rice mill situated there. Here we made final preparations for an early morning start on horseback the next day. That evening two Americans came to Mr. Clark's house and requested shelter for the night. They had gone by train that morning to Dagupan, the northern terminus of the railway, intending to spend the night there. A squad of Philippine soldiers at the railway station, however, had demanded of them passes signed by Señor Aguinaldo. For want of them they were compelled to remain within the station until the departure of the next train south, which train they were required to board. This train remained for the night at Bayambang. This evidence of the attitude of the Philippine troops toward travelers increased our fears that our progress would be opposed at the first town on our route. Through the influence of Mr. Clark we obtained from the "presidente local" of the town of Bayambang a letter to the "presidente local" of the town of Rosales, the first town of importance on our route. This letter merely requested that we be allowed to continue our journey through that town.

5. At daylight next morning, October 10, we left Bayambang and took the road for Rosales. We reached that town just before sundown and pitched our tent on the bank of the river Agno, outside the limits of the town. For the first 5 or 6 miles from Bayambang we found the roads in good condition and traveled with ease. Nearer to Rosales the roads were deep with mud and covered with water in places. We were forced to go on foot the greater part of the distance, men and horses having great difficulty in making their way. About 11 o'clock in the morning we passed through the small town of Alcala. There were 12 soldiers stationed at this town in charge of a sergeant. They were armed with Remington rifles. We were met by the civil authorities and were surrounded by the people. Much curiosity was expressed in regard to our outfit, but it was of a harmless and friendly nature. No suspicion was excited and passports were not mentioned. The soldiers did not assert themselves in any way.

6. Between Alcala and Rosales we passed from the province of Pangasinan to that of Nueva Icaja. The province of Pangasinan is not touched upon in this report, since, except for the few miles traveled on the morning of October 10, we traversed it only by rail.

7. We were visited shortly after dark at our camp near Rosales by a messenger from the presidente local of that town with an invitation to pass the night at the government building or "presidencia." As we were already unpacked, we decided to remain in camp. We sent back to the presidente local by his messenger the letter we had obtained from the presidente local at Bayambang. We were visited during the evening by many natives from the town, among them several civil officials. No soldiers came near the camp. The next morning, October 11, we continued our journey, reaching Rosales in a few minutes. We visited the "presidencia," where we were met by the presidente local and all other natives of consequence in the town. We were allowed to proceed without protest, although surprise was expressed that we had not obtained written passports from the Philippine government. There were about 20 soldiers in this town, armed, as before, with Remington rifles and commanded by a sergeant. We were detained at Rosales only a short time and then took the road for Humangan.

8. From Rosales to Humangan, and thence to San Jose, our experiences of travel were much the same as those already described. The road led through the low rice region of the province of Nueva Icaja. It rained almost constantly, and the roads were nearly impassable. We went on foot much of the distance. The pack horses were unable to carry their loads, and we were forced to engage natives to relieve them. Labor was cheap. Ten men could usually be engaged for a day for the sum of $2 in silver, or less than 10 cents in gold per man. We traveled slowly over this distance, the labor of walking through the mud, frequently over our knees, being excessive. The horses grew poor rapidly and we were forced to husband their strength. They were occasionally prostrated in the road and our progress was delayed until they could recover their strength. Moreover, we could seldom find proper food for them at night. As many as three at a time were unable to carry any weight for several days. One servant became ill and was left at a village. The rest of the party retained their health, with the exception of occasional cases of diarrhea and consequent sickness at the stomach, which did not prevent traveling. Our food during this period consisted of bacon and hardtack, which we had brought with us, and chickens and rice, which we obtained from the natives. The cooking was done by our own servant.

9. Through this part of the province of Nueva Icaja almost the only form of agriculture encouraged at present by the natives is rice growing. A little sugar is also raised. The land is very rich; we encountered no barren or unfertile spots. The fields at this season of the year are several inches deep with water. There is no timber of value along the direct line of our route, but in the hills along the River Agno forests could be seen. We passed through similar forests later, which will be treated in their turn. The forests in this district, however, are nearer to a market. There are very few horses and practically no cattle. There are a great number of buffalo, and these are of extreme utility. The principal labor of the natives at this season is the thrashing of rice. This is done very primitively with implements that resemble on a large scale the pestle and mortar of a chemist. The mortar is replaced by a section of a log of hard wood hollowed out to receive the grain, the pestle by a hard club from 4 to 5 feet long and about 6 inches in diameter at each end. This club is scraped down at the middle to the size of the hand. In thrashing out the rice the native stands above the mortar and throws his club vertically into it with one hand, catching it up with the other hand and repeating the blow, always changing hands at the bottom of the stroke. Usually three or four natives beat into the same mortar and a certain cadence is always maintained. We have even seen them accompanied by a musical instrument. They pursue this occupation very industriously, and we seldom in this district got beyond the muffled sound of the rice beaters. A little cotton weaving is also done here. The cotton thread is brought from Manila and woven on crude bamboo looms into rough cloth, used by the natives.

10. In the villages of Humangan and Lupao there are a few Spanish prisoners—priests, soldiers, and civil officials. We have seen representatives of each of these three classes in these towns. We could detect no signs of previous ill-treatment, nor of undue restriction. On the contrary, they appeared to possess the freedom of the town in which they lived.

11. The towns in this section are neither large nor important. Humangan, the largest, has not over two or three thousand inhabitants. The church, with the convent attached, is the largest building in each town; it is built of planed wood, whitewashed. There are three or four houses of planed wood in each town, the rest of the village consisting of grass huts. The presidente local and other local officers are native Filipinos. Most of them have received a certain amount of education at religious schools in Manila. They are intelligent men and are extremely eager to learn news from the outside world. Their knowledge of modern history and geography, however, is extremely limited; and their ignorance of current events is surprising. We brought them their first definite information with regard to Cuba and to their own present status. One or two of them had heard of the Congress at Paris; but no one had any idea as to its object, nor as to its relation to themselves. They were well grounded on only three points—the destruction of the Spanish squadron in Manila Harbor, the surrender of Manila, and the declaration by the Philippine government at Malolos of the independence of the islands and the establishment of a republican form of government with Señor Aguinaldo as president. Even on these points the details they had received were very inaccurate. Between the towns of Rosales and Humangan there are two small villages, called barrios, varying in population from one to three thousand inhabitants. We were thus enabled to sleep in a hut over night, and avoid camping in the wet fields by the roadside. These barrios are under the jurisdiction of the nearest town or "pueblo." There were soldiers in each town, but not more than twenty in any place, and there was no commissioned officer in the district. We were cordially received everywhere, not only by the heads of the town, but also by the laboring and farming people, who always saluted us in a friendly manner when we passed. On leaving each town our interpreter was presented by the presidente local with passes. These passes always included our native servants and packmen and sometimes ourselves as well. They were good only to the next town, and secured a comparatively prompt exchange of packmen. We were never allowed to take any men farther than to the next town without permanently attaching them to our party. It is the duty of the presidente local of each town to do his share in facilitating the journey of every properly accredited traveler. Usually the assistance brings him in a pecuniary return. The duty then becomes a privilege, and is very zealously guarded.

12. We arrived at the town of San Jose on the evening of October 11 and spent the night there. There was the usual guard here of between 12 and 20 soldiers, armed with Remington rifles and commanded by a noncommissioned officer. We had been warned by the official of the last town that San Jose must inevitably prove the end of our journey. There is no road for 30 miles beyond this point, and in this season the natives consider the trail impassable to white men. Very few of the natives themselves attempt it in the months of rain. We found at San Jose, however, 10 men willing to accompany us as pack bearers, and with these we started out next morning. The trail proved to be a little better than represented. Twenty-four hours more of rain would have made at least three mountain streams impassable. The trail is, moreover, extremely intricate. It leads for over half a mile along a shoal in a small river, and follows the beds of different mountain streams for many times that distance. Rushing water, frequently knee deep on the horses, covered these stretches of the trail at the time we passed. On hand grass and underbrush grow thickly over the trail and conceal it for considerable distances. Our guide had spent his life in this district and had traveled the trail very often. He deviated from it twice that day, however, and had much difficulty in regaining it. During the insurrection a company of Spanish soldiers had been sent over this trail. Our guide pointed out many spots where numbers of them had been ambushed and slain. Huts that had been built for shelter at night could frequently be seen. According to the statement of our guide, very few of this Spanish force lived to reach the town of Carrangan. It is undoubtedly a trail that a few men could hold against heavy odds; it is the first of this nature we have seen. It is very hilly and the ascents are steep, crooked, and surrounded by heavy trees and underbrush. Numerous rapid streams were crossed during the day. The pack bearers at first refused to cross two streams that were deeper and more rapid than the others. They required both encouragement and example before they could be induced to make the attempt. It rained fiercely all day.

13. At dark we arrived at the town of Puncan. This town is the smallest and least pretentious that we visited during our entire journey. It has a population of about 300 inhabitants, only two or three of whom speak Spanish, and these imperfectly. The presidencia is a thatched hut with only one room. Next morning we continued our journey with the same pack men as before. The presidente local of the town could not provide a sufficient number and permitted this breach of etiquette.

15. The journey of this day was a repetition of our experience of the preceding day, with the exception that the rain was neither so continuous nor so violent. At 3 o'clock we reached the bank of the last river that separated us from the town of Carranglan. This river, the Rio Barat, was swollen to such an extent that our horses were carried off their feet before the bed of the stream was reached. Not being able to get our freight across the stream with the means at hand, we attracted the attention of a native on the other bank by discharging our firearms and sent him to the town of Carranglan to procure buffalo for our assistance. The buffalo did not arrive that evening, however, and we spent the night in camp on the bank of the river. Next morning we found that the river had gone down considerably. Buffalo arrived from the town, and with their help we crossed in safety with all our freight.

16. On the other bank we were met by a lieutenant of the Philippine army, the first military officer we had seen since leaving the railroad. We were escorted by him and his soldiers to the presidencia. The presidente local received us rather coolly and treated us in that manner while we were his guests. He asked us for passports from the central government, and expressed surprise and suspicion when he learned that we had none in writing. He was the only civil officer that we met until after we left Aparri that joined with the military power in opposing our progress. Moreover, he was the only one that seemed to have more power and influence in his own town than the military officers stationed there. The troops here consisted of 40 soldiers armed with Remington rifles and commanded by the officer we had met at the river.

17. We spent the day at Carranglan, drying our baggage, which had been constantly wet for two days and had begun to mold. The officers here told us that there were still worse rivers to cross than those we had already encountered and other obstacles as well. This day was the 17th of October. At the rate we were traveling it was plainly impossible to accomplish the journey planned by November 5, and there appeared at this time no prospect of an improvement in the roads. We sent, therefore, letters addressed to the commanding officer U. S. S. Monadnock, requesting of the commander in chief an extension of leave of absence until November 20. These letters were given to the presidente local, who assured us that they would arrive safely at their destination.

18. We left Carranglan next morning. The presidente local insisted upon our taking a guard of 12 soldiers, with a sergeant, to protect us against the Igorrotes or savages, that are said to infest the hills between this town and Aritao. We had but little difficulty in making this trip, which lasted two days. The rain had ceased, and the rivers had decreased so much in size that they were crossed with ease. At the end of the first day we camped at the foot of the Caraballo Sur Mountains, at an elevation of 200 meters above the sea level. The next day we crossed the mountains. The road is very steep and of a clayey formation. It ascends very quickly to a height of 1,050 meters, as recorded by our barometer, and then descends at about the same incline to an elevation of between 200 and 300 meters. The northern slope is covered with stones and pebbles. At the highest point of the road, a very well-defined summit, there is a stone barricade facing both slopes. This barricade was left here by the Spanish soldiers during the insurrection. They were driven from it by lack of water. It is an extremely strong position. At a level spot on the northern slope, about 500 feet below the summit, the Spanish troops have built a more elaborate fortification, consisting of a bamboo stockade inclosing a rectangular barricade of stones with a small block-house at each end. There is a watchtower at each corner of the stockade. This fortification can be fired upon from above and approached from several directions at the same time.

19. We arrived at Aritao shortly before sundown. A broad branch of the Rio Magat separated us from this town. There was a "banca" or native dugout canoe, however, in which men and baggage were taken to the other side, while the horses were swum across at a point higher up the stream. These facilities for crossing streams were always available when necessary during the remainder of our journey. In the mountains and highlands through which we passed in the last two or three days there are extensive forests. The forests are not homogeneous but contain many different classes of trees, the timber of which is in many cases valueless. Of the timber which we have seen the most valued on the island is the "mulawe," so called both in Spanish and Tegnala. This is a tall straight tree with very few branches; the bark is very light in color but the wood is very dark and close-grained and resists water and weather. It is much used for boats and for the floors and exposed uprights of houses. There is also much bamboo, some of which has been cut. The heavier trees are as yet unmolested. We saw no signs of savages nor of poisonous snakes against which we had been warned by the natives of the district. In going from Carranglan to Aritao we went from the province of Nueva Iclia to that of Nueva Vizcaya.

20. We were very cordially received by the presidente local of Aritao. On leaving next morning we were saluted by the music of a brass band and by the ringing of church bells. This precedent was followed by many of the towns which we visited in the next few days. There were about 30 soldiers at Aritao, but no commissioned officers. We were escorted on our journey by a squad of 6 mounted soldiers. At Dupax our escort was exchanged for a detail from that town. There, also, there were about 30 soldiers, commanded by a sergeant. Toward evening we arrived at the town of Bambang. These towns of Aritao, Dupax, and Bambang are much superior in size and appearance to those of Nueva Iclia. These towns and those to the northward of them lie in the valleys of the Rio Magat and the Rio Grande de Cagayan. They have been seats of Spanish authority for over a century. A telegraph line previously connected the towns in these valleys with Manila. This line, however, was torn down during the insurrection. The native officials have repaired it between Bambang and Aparri, using barbed wire. They have been forced to leave many poles uninsulated and short circuits frequently occur, especially in wet weather. The line between Bambang and Carranglan is still down. There are many substantial wooden houses in each town. The church, with its convent, is usually built of brick and is very elaborate. The church at Aritao and many others date back over a hundred years. The native officials and leading men are better educated and better informed than those we had previously met. They possess, in addition, the same desire to improve their knowledge and the same receptivity that we had noticed in their countrymen.

21. We spent the night at Bambang. The presidente local was absent, attending a fiesta or carnival at Ilagan. A military officer stationed here received us and entertained us. This officer, Lieutenant Aguineldo, is a nephew of Don Emilio. He is the first military officer we have met since leaving Carranglan. He commands the usual force of 30 or 40 soldiers. Our treatment at this town was extremely friendly and cordial.

22. We spent the night at Bambang. We were accompanied by several soldiers and Lieutenant Aguineldo. This was the first time that a commissioned officer had formed part of our escort. This town is the capital of the province, and has a population of about 12,000 inhabitants. At this place we met the first formidable opposition to our progress. A military officer of the rank of comandante, corresponding to the grade of major in our Army, is stationed at this town, and is in fact the governor of the province under the orders of the colonel commanding in this district. He was absent at the time of our arrival, attending the fiesta at Ilagan. His place was taken by the next military officer in rank, Lieutenant Gemenes. This officer received us very cordially and demanded passports. He refused to be satisfied with our statement of the promise we had received from Don Emilio Aguineldo. He informed us that before permitting us to proceed he would require the authority of his colonel, who was then at Ilagan. He sent a telegram concerning us to the colonel and left us to await the decision of that officer.

23. We spent the afternoon and night at the house of a native lawyer, Señor Arriola. Our host was a very intelligent man, and we explained our position fully to him. We told him that passports are not required of travelers in the United States nor in any other free country. This information seemed to surprise him very much, but he readily accepted it as an argument against the attitude of the local lieutenant toward us. He left us for a short time to speak with other men of importance in the town and to use his influence in our favor. When he returned he assured us that we were at perfect liberty to travel without passes, and that the only question remaining was whether or not we were entitled to a military escort. As we would have gladly dispensed with the escort, we accepted this information as a decision entirely in our favor.

24. Next morning Lieutenant Gemenes came very early to the house where we were entertained, to tell us that a military escort was ready to accompany us on our journey at any hour. He hoped that we cherished no ill will against him for his action on the preceding day. We were not able to determine whether a favorable reply had been received from the colonel or whether this change of attitude was due to our arguments on the evening previous and to the influence of Señor Arriola. We left Bambang with an escort consisting of a second lieutenant and 10 soldiers. The band was paraded and church bells rung. There was the greatest possible cordiality of feeling. At Bambang there are stationed the comandante, First Lieutenant Gemenes, and a second lieutenant. There are 60 or 70 soldiers at Bambang, armed, in this case, with both Remington and Mauser rifles.

25. We proceeded through the town of Solano to Bagagag. These towns are similar to Bambang and Dupax. They have the customary guard of about 30 soldiers. There are no commissioned officers in these towns, the soldiers being controlled by the officers at Bambang. We were cordially received everywhere during this day and the next, and were greeted unconditionally as friends. From Aritao to Bambang we had found very good roads. The weather had been clear since our departure from Carranglan, and the roads were consequently dry and the traveling easy. From Bagagag to the next town (called Estella on the map), Cordon, there is only a mountain trail. This trail is infested at certain seasons by Igorrotes, who waylay and murder persons traveling in small and unarmed parties. Several murders have occurred here recently. Three small parties of natives, with horses and buffaloes, had been waiting at Bagagag for several days for an opportunity to travel with a military escort. They joined us next day.

26. We left Bagagag next morning with 12 soldiers. These, with the pack bearers and natives accompanying us, brought our number up to 47. The trail over these mountains is a good road, very easy of ascent. It winds up the slope, making the incline very gradual. The mountains are covered with forests similar to those on the Caraballo, and contain many small streams. There are two bamboo stockades between Bagagag and Cordon. One of these, Diadi, is indicated on the map; the other, Rosario, has been recently erected by the native government. It is situated about halfway between Bagagag and Diadi. Each stockade has a garrison of 15 soldiers in command of a sergeant. These stockades are merely outposts against the Igorrotes. They are very frail and would offer no resistance to a rifle bullet. In passing over these mountains our escorts used their rifles very freely, firing into every thick bush that might conceal a savage and frequently into the air as well, in order, they said, that the Igorrotes might know that our party carried firearms. We spent the night at Cordon, where the feeling toward us proved to be very friendly. There are 30 soldiers at Cordon under command of a first lieutenant.

27. In passing from Diadi to Cordon we went from the province of Nueva Vizcaya into that of Isabella. Nueva Vizcaya is a rich province naturally, but it is surrounded by the mountains, and has no outlet. The Rio Magat which connects the province with Rio Grande de Cagayan is not navigable, even for canoes of large size. The province produces principally rice, sugar, cocoa, and coffee. It is also rich in timber.

28. We left next morning, October 24, for Carig, intending to reach Echague that night. We were escorted by 8 soldiers and the lieutenant. We found the road to Carig in good condition, and reached that town about 10 o'clock. This town is small and poor. It has a guard of only 15 soldiers, with no officers. The garrison had been reduced to a minimum on account of an illness prevalent in the immediate locality, which had affected the soldiers. We left Carig after a short stay for breakfast with a squad of 5 soldiers. One of them introduced himself as Señor Villa, comandante of the military forces of the province of Isabella. His companion was Lieutenant Guzman, an officer acting as his aide. Señor Villa informed us that he had received orders from his colonel to leave his headquarters at Ilagan and to make all possible speed toward Bambang, where we had last been heard from. His orders were to demand passports from us signed by Don Emilio Aguineldo. If we were traveling without them, he was to examine into the object of our journey and to consult by wire with his colonel before permitting us to proceed. As there was no telegraph station at Echague, we were forced to turn back to Carig. Here we were informed that the line was down somewhere between the station and Ilagan. Men were sent out to repair it, and we were forced to wait until it should be opened. We were taken by the comandante to the convent of the town and installed there. Our delay in this town lasted seven days, from noon October 24 to noon October 31.

29. The first two days were occupied in repairing the lines. On October 27 Señor Villa was able to communicate with his colonel. He brought back the answer that that officer had already sent a messenger to the central government asking for instructions. We were required to await the answer of the messenger, which had been, according to the information we received, three days on the road. Señor Villa assured us that an answer would arrive in three days. This appeared impossible to us, but we were obliged to accept his statement. After the expiration of three days we gave to Señor Villa, and requested him to send to Colonel Tirona, a telegram signed by ourselves. That was a mere statement that our accommodations were poor in Carig, and that, if a longer delay was necessary, we desired to proceed to Ilagan. This telegram was sent to Aparri. The colonel, however, at that time was on his way from Ilagan to Aparri. That night it rained and there was a violent wind. Next morning the line was down in several places. While we were waiting for the line to be repaired we composed a long telegram to Colonel Tirona, stating our position, explaining that we were required to return to Manila by the 26th of November, and requesting him to decide from his own authority whether we should proceed or turn back. On the morning of October 31 we gave the telegram to Señor Villa. Señor Villa himself wrote a telegram to accompany ours, stating that, in his opinion, we had not come into the country to draw plans or for any other military purpose. This was a statement which he had given us to understand at the time had formed part of his original telegram to Colonel Tirona a few days before. The line from Carig to Ilagan was still closed, but that from Ilagan to Aparri was supposed to be open. The two telegrams were given to a mounted courier with orders to take them with all speed to Ilagan; to send them from there by wire, and to return with the answer. This journey would have occupied at least three days. Fortunately the line to Ilagan was reported open just as the courier was about to start. His orders were accordingly countermanded. Colonel Tirona's answer to our first telegram came during the morning. It was favorable. He saluted us affectionately, and authorized Señor Villa to accompany us to Ilagan.

30. During our detention at Carig we were not treated as prisoners. We were informed that if we wished to return to Manila by the same road we had followed in leaving it we were at liberty to do so. Within the village itself we had, of course, entire liberty. We asked Señor Villa if the Philippine republic intended to demand passports of travelers, and used the same argument that had proved so efficient at Bayombong. He replied that it would be the custom only in time of war. He classed this period as a time of war and the congress at Paris as a mere suspension of hostilities, at the end of which their nation might again be enveloped in war. Our relations with Señor Villa were mainly official. His manner toward us was brusque, and at times discourteous. He was extremely suspicious of us, particularly of the diary that we kept from day to day, and of a camera that formed part of our equipment. He became slowly convinced, however, that we were not seeking for military information. After he had assured himself of this, he told us that the colonel had feared that we were making maps of the country. During the rest of our journey we were entirely free from the taint of this suspicion. According to Señor Villa's statement, the charge had first been made by the Spanish prisoners, who have never ceased to warn the natives that American troops would come into the province to conquer them, when they would find themselves in worse hands than before they rebelled against Spain.

31. A redeeming feature of our detention at Carig was the companionship of two lieutenants of the Philippine army that were quartered with us. These officers, Lieutenant Guzman and Lieutenant Clarabal, were very pleasant and gentlemanly.

32. We left Carig on the afternoon of October 31, accompanied by Commandante Villa, Lieutenant Guzman, Lieutenant Clarabal, and the 5 soldiers that had arrived with the commandante. It had rained almost constantly during the last week, and the two rivers between Carig and Echague were greatly swollen. We lost a horse in the river Carig, but crossed without other accident. In these streams, and particularly in the river Magat and the Rio Grande de Cagayan, there are many alligators, of which the natives are in great fear. No native will venture into the water nor into the grass along the bank until he has first thrown stones in front of him to frighten away any alligators which may be in the neighborhood.

33. Echague is somewhat larger and more pretentious than Carig. It has a guard of 30 soldiers. From this town we went by boat to Ilagan, sending the servants with the horses by the road. The boat was a dugout 25 feet long and 3 feet wide, with a grass canopy amidship 8 feet long. It was rowed by six natives. There are many eddies and whirlpools in the river, rendering it for some distance below Echague almost unnavigable even for bancas. We shipped water repeatedly and were twice nearly swamped. Farther down, particularly below the mouth of the Rio Magat, the stream is deeper and quieter, and cascos and pangas come up to this point with freight received from the steamers at Aparri.

34. We arrived at Ilagan that evening, November 1. This town is the capital city of the province of Isabella. It has a population of between ten and fifteen thousand inhabitants, and has many large wooden houses roofed with corrugated iron, giving it rather a European appearance. It is well situated for defense, being at the junction of the Rio Pinnacananan with the Rio Grande. It is protected by these wide streams from all points except the south. To attack the city by land from the south it would be necessary to bring troops up the eastern side of the Rio Grande, where there are no roads. The site of the city is raised, moreover, about 40 feet above the level of the river. At this city there are stationed the commandante, Señor Villa, 2 captains, 4 lieutenants, 1 surgeon, and about 100 soldiers. Besides the officers named above, there is a "commandante interno," or civil officer, who takes charge in the absence of the commandante.

35. We remained at Ilagan two days and were treated with great friendliness. The commandante interno, who is the highest civil officer in the province, was particularly cordial. This gentleman, Señor Guzman, father of the lieutenant who was with us at Carig, is a member of one of the most influential families in the province, and his friendship was of great advantage to us. In this town we were entertained at the house of a wealthy citizen. The first night after our arrival a ball was given in our honor, at which there were over forty young ladies and an equal number of well-dressed and gentlemanly men. The ball was well conducted. The dances were Spanish. The next evening we were invited to the theater to see two one-act Spanish comedies, presented by the society young people of the town. They were both excellently given, and spoke well for the intelligence of the players.

36. We desired to continue our journey from Ilagan to Tuguegarao and from that point across the mountains to the western coast. This request was wired by Señor Villa to Colonel Tirona at Aparri. That officer replied that it would not be possible to make the proposed trip at this season of the year. He invited us to proceed to Aparri, saying that he would send a steam launch up the river to take us to that city. We replied by another telegram, repeating our request and saying that the trip across the mountains would be made at our own risk. The reply was a courteously worded but positive refusal. The colonel had sent out messengers to examine the roads and they reported them impassable. Moreover, there was danger from Igorrotes. He said that he felt himself responsible for our safety in the district over which he held command. He feared that any accident happening to our party might be misconstrued by our Government and create a wrong and injurious impression of the good faith of the Philippines and the tranquillity of the country. He repeated his invitation to visit Aparri, take a steamer from that port, disembark at a northern point on the western coast, and continue our journey south by land. This arrangement was accepted as the most satisfactory one left open to us.

37. There are many Spanish prisoners in this town—civil officers, priests, soldiers. Eighty-four priests were paraded in the street for our inspection. The greater number of them were dressed in civilian garb, only four or five of them wearing the robes of their office. Nearly all of them were long hair and beards. They appeared in good health, and we could detect no evidence of maltreatment. These priests had been assembled from different parts of the province. They are kept under stricter guard than either of the other two classes of prisoners for the reason that the native officials fear that if permitted to go among the people they will use the influence they possess through their position in the church to incite them against the Philippine government. We also met Don José Perez, a Spaniard, who had previously been governor of the island. He was well dressed and appeared to be enjoying all the ordinary comforts.

38. Our horses arrived at Ilagan November 2 and were sent on to Aparri next day. The steam launch mentioned by the colonel not arriving on time, we expressed our desire to set out in a canoe without delay. A "panga" or large built-up canoe, rowed by twelve men, was accordingly prepared. Friday morning, November 4, we embarked for Aparri. We were accompanied on the journey by Commandante Villa and Lieutenant Guzman. All the officers, civil and military, of the town accompanied us to the boat and wished us a pleasant journey.

39. The trip from Ilagan to Aparri lasted three days. We stopped at only one town on the way. This was Cabagan Viejo, which we visited while waiting for the moon to rise on the evening of the third day. At 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the second day we were met, about 18 miles above Aparri, by the steam launch sent by Colonel Tirona. We were taken in tow and arrived at Aparri that night, November 5.

40. In these two days we passed out of the province of Isabella and entirely through the province of Cagayan. These are the leading tobacco provinces in the island. An idea of their wealth can be obtained from the fact that before the Philippine insurrection $3,000,000 in tobacco alone came yearly from the one province of Isabella. The tobacco of this province is preferred for exportation to that of Cagayan. Both provinces raise also sugar, rice, coconuts, and coffee. Cattle also are shipped from Aparri. The Rio Grande through these provinces is the great artery of trade. Tobacco is sent down the river in cascos and pangas, and imports from Aparri are taken back by the same means. The current is very swift, and it is slow and difficult work to ascend the river in these boats. Poling is the method resorted to. The banks of the river are about 20 feet above the stream over most of the distance and are regular throughout. The width of the river varies from 100 to 500 yards. Much fishing with nets is done in the river.

41. At Aparri we went alongside the Philippina and reached the wharf by crossing this vessel. We were met on board by Commandante Leyba, military commander in the province of Cagayan. We were taken to a private house, where we were quartered during our stay, at Aparri. Here we met Colonel Tirona, commander of the military district, including the provinces of Nueva Vizcaya, Isabella, and Cagayan. He welcomed us cordially and continued from that time to treat us in a very friendly manner. We remained at Aparri three days, until the departure of the steamer Oso, November 8.

42. The steamer Saturnas, which had left the harbor the day before our arrival, brought news from Hongkong papers that the Senators from the United States at the congress of Paris favored the independence of the islands, with an American protectorate. Colonel Tirona considered the information of sufficient reliability to justify him in regarding the Philippine independence as assured and warfare in the island at an end. For this reason he proceeded to relinquish the military command he held over the province and to place this power in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. On the day following our arrival in Aparri the ceremony occurred which solemnized this transfer of authority in the province of Cagayan. The presidents locales of all the towns in the province were present at the ceremony, conducted by a native priest. After the priest had retired Colonel Tirona made a short speech, stating that, since in all probabilities permanent peace was at hand, it became his duty to relinquish the authority he had previously held over the province and to place it in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. He then handed the staff of office to the man who had been elected "jefe provincial."

This officer also made a speech, in which he thanked the disciplined military forces and their colonel for the service they had rendered the province and assured them that the work they had begun would be perpetuated by the people of the province; where every man, woman and child stood ready to take up arms to defend their newly won liberty and to resist with the last drop of their blood the attempt of any nation whatever to bring them back to their former state of dependence. His speech was very impassioned. He then knelt, placed his hand on an open Bible, and took the oath of office. He was followed by the three other officers who constitute the provincial government, the heads of the three departments—justice, police, and internal revenue. Every town in this province has this same organization. At the time of our departure Colonel Tirona planned to go within a few days to Ilagan and from there to Bayombong, repeating this ceremony in the capital city of each province.

43. We were hospitably entertained at the Aparri; two balls were given in our honor. The town has a population of 20,000 inhabitants. It has many handsome houses and several well-defined streets. The military force stationed here consists of 300 soldiers, in addition to which the harbor has the protection of the gunboat Philippina, which carries two guns of a caliber of about 3 inches. There are several officers here, three captains and five or six lieutenants. The colonel goes from town to town in his district, and Commandante Leyba spends part of his time at Tuguegarao. There are no Spaniards here, with the exception of two or three merchants; one of these, representing the company of the steamer Saturnas we have met. He is pursuing his business entirely unmolested. All the priests, soldiers, and civil officers have been sent to Tuguegarao and other towns up the river. Colonel Tirona does not consider them secure in a port town.

44. We left Aparri November 9 on the steamer Oso. Before leaving Colonel Tirona provided us with a letter directed to Colonel Tino, at Vigan, in the province of Ilocos Sur; or, in the event of his absence from that town to the commandante. This letter was sealed. The steamer left port at 12:30 p. m., drawing 14 feet 9 inches; Captain Pederson, commanding the Oso, was not acquainted with the port of Curriniao, in the province of Ilocos Norte, the port at which we wished to disembark, but took us to Salomague, a few miles farther south, in the province of Ilocos Sur. The natives assert that the former harbor is much more secure and easy to enter than the latter. The Oso remained outside the breakers, while we were put ashore in a ship's boat. We passed several native canoes going out to the ship, the leading one having on board a sergeant with a squad of soldiers. We landed on the beach and immediately sent the boat back to the ship. A few minutes later two officials from the town of Cabuao rode up. Our arrival had been reported to them, and they had come immediately to refuse us permission to disembark. The Oso was already under way, however, and they were not able to carry out their intention. On the shore at Salomague there is a fortification about 5 feet high and 150 feet long. This barricade is built of sticks arranged in two rows and filled in between with sand and coral stones.

Its walls are about 4 feet thick, and it is built in the form of a crescent, with the concave part toward the sea. The formation of the reefs here and for some distance south along the coast is coral. The officers who met us were both dressed in military uniform. One of them wore the insignia of a first lieutenant, the other none whatever. Horses were provided for us, and we accompanied the officers to Cabuao. The officer without insignia of rank proved to be a native priest, the curé of the village. He put on his robe over his uniform as soon as he reached the convent. It is a fact worthy of note that in every town we visited in the provinces on the western coast we were met by a curé, who appeared to have great influence in civil matters. In the four provinces we had previously visited, on the contrary, we saw only one native priest. He was in a church performing service. At Cabuao our letter to Colonel Tino was not sufficient to gain permission to proceed. We were detained here all day, while the lieutenant sent a messenger to Vigan to obtain instruction from the commandante. The telegraph line was down and we could not wire. We were treated very coolly at this town and were regarded with suspicion. Next morning, an answer not having been received from Vigan, we asserted our right to proceed to that town to present our letter to the commandante. The lieutenant finally withdrew his objections. There were no transportation accommodations. We succeeded at length in buying one horse and a broken-down kalis, in which only one could ride. We proceeded to the town of Lapo, where we changed vehicles. We left that town in a kalis drawn by a steer. We were halfway between Lapo and Magsingal when we were met by three military officers—two captains and a lieutenant—in a carriage drawn by two horses. The senior captain informed us that they had been sent down from Vigan by the commandante, with orders to require us to turn back and reembark on our ship, the report having reached Vigan that we had disembarked from an American man-of-war, which was still waiting for us at Salomague. When we explained our position and showed them the letter to Colonel Tino, or, in case of his absence, where they could communicate with their superior. They very politely insisted on our taking their carriage, while they followed in our cart. We were delayed at Magsingal until the early evening, waiting for an answer from the commandante. He brought the answer himself, in a handsome carriage drawn by four horses. He had with him a copy of the order he had just received from the Philippine secretary of war. This order granted liberty to persons of any nation, except Spain, to travel at will through the islands, under certain restrictions, viz. that they could not carry arms, nor approach within 200 meters of a fortification, nor make any plans, or take photographs of them. In compliance with this order, we were allowed to proceed, but were requested to give up all our arms, including our revolvers. We went on to Vigan that night, accompanied by the commandante and five other officers who had assembled at Magsingal. We rode in carriages, none of them drawn by fewer than three horses, and arrived at Vigan about 8 o'clock. Vigan is a town of about 27,000 inhabitants. Its streets are well laid out, and all the houses near the center of the town are built of wood, usually whitewashed. It has much more the appearance of a city than any other town we have visited. We were entertained at the palacio. This building before the insurrection had been the residence of the governor of the province, but it is now used as the headquarters of Colonel Tino. It is by far the handsomest house we have seen outside of Manila, and is perhaps the equal of any there. There is another house in the town even more elegant; this was formerly the residence of the archbishop. At the palacio there are quartered over eighteen military officers; they are all very young, as is usual in the Philippine army. The oldest one among them was a man of 29 years, with the grade of captain.

46. We remained at Vigan all next day, November 12. It had rained during the night, rendering impassable a part of the road to the next town. We walked through the town and visited the houses of several tradespeople. At one of these houses we heard the first and only definite complaint which came to our ears during the entire journey on the part of the natives against the present government. These people complained of the taxes imposed upon them, and even went so far as to state that they preferred the Spanish Government. This statement was made in the presence of a party of six natives and was acquiesced in by all; they were all, however, of the same family.

47. Next morning we left Vigan and proceeded to Santa Maria, passing through the towns of Santa and Narvacan. Between Santa and Narvacan we came to the pass of Pidig. The road here goes between a bold rocky point and the sea. To-day the sea line was 70 or 80 feet from the bluff, but in windy weather the waves cover the road and dash against the bluff. During the insurrection the Spaniards attempted to defend this pass; their barricades are still standing. We were escorted out of Vigan by the commandante and eight of his officers, all in carriages. These turned back, one at a time, until we were left with one lieutenant, who had been detailed to accompany us to San Fernando, and by two captains, who were going home on leave of absence. We also had a guard of four soldiers, who rode ahead with pennants and cleared the road. At each town we were joined by the senior officer stationed there, who accompanied us on horseback to the next town. From Narvacan we were accompanied to Santa Maria by Captain Natidad, an officer 18 years of age, who commands the military forces in the three neighboring towns. Captain Natidad remained with us at Santa Maria, where we spent the night in a convent. We intended to leave this town by trail for the mountains, passing through the provinces of Lepanto and Benguet and returning to the main road in the province of Union. When we wished to start next morning, Captain Natidad opposed our going, saying that he was under orders to take that action. It rained very hard all night and all morning, and the Captain gave as his first reason that the roads were not passable. It was only when we continued to insist that he told us positively that he could not permit us to go, as there was danger from Igorrotes and Colonel Tino felt himself responsible for our safety. He told us that Colonel Tino had invited us to visit him at San Fernando. We left Santa Maria that afternoon and reached Condon the next night, passing through the towns of San Esteban and Santiago. We were escorted by the lieutenant and Captain Natidad. We found Condon a handsome town systematically laid out. After Vigan, it is the handsomest town we visited. There are two captains here and several lieutenants. We were received here with unusual cordiality and were accompanied out of town next morning by the presidente local and by a captain stationed at the town. Our journey this day took us to Namagpacan, passing through the towns of Santa Lucia, Santa Cruz, and Tagudin. Fresh horses were procured at each town and the officers accompanying us were changed.

48. In going from Tagudin to Bangar we passed from the province of Ilocos Sur into that of Union. The province of Ilocos Sur raises principally rice, tobacco, sugar, cattle, and sheep. The tobacco is of an inferior quality, being coarser and stronger than that raised in Isabella and Cagayan. The cultivation of coconuts is profitable and is increasing. Goats and pigs are raised in great numbers. Many of the people are engaged in the weaving of cotton, from which they make cloth, towels, etc. The cloth is coarse, but very strong. The natives realize the inferiority of the cloth and the discrepancy between its commercial value and the labor expended on it. Some of the cotton comes from Ilocos Norte and from Abra; much of it, however, comes as thread from Manila. The only part of the province that is cultivated or settled is a narrow strip between the province and the sea. This strip is very thickly settled. In the mountains there are mines of copper, sulphur, and gold; but these we have not seen. The Spaniards have spent much time and labor on these coast provinces, relatively speaking. Probably the best road in the island is the one on which we traveled through Ilocos Sur and Union. It is raised above the level of the fields, and has a foundation of stone and lime. Bridges were built when the road was constructed, over a hundred years ago, but they are down now. Some of these were passable at the beginning of the insurrection, but were burned during that struggle. At the beginning of the dry season every year bamboo bridges were put across these streams. They usually last from December to June. Several of them have already been built this year, but the recent rains had caused them to be washed away. During the rainy months other methods are adopted for crossing these streams. The streams are numerous, but many of them have very little current. They are crossed by a ferry—a bamboo raft hauled across by means of a bamboo rope which spans the stream. Traveling on this road in the rainy season is rather difficult. Carriages are usually used but they are frequently mired and the passengers are compelled to walk. The carriages are drawn by either horses, steers, or buffaloes, according to the state of the road. The towns along this road have usually many wooden houses, and invariably a very handsome church and convent, usually of brick. There are more barriers here than in the eastern provinces; each town has two or three. Spanish soldiers laid waste this region during the insurrection of 1898. The principal buildings in many towns have been burnt, particularly in the province of Union. On the other hand, during the last insurrection the Spaniards took refuge in the large buildings, and these are consequently riddled with rifle shots.

49. We spent the night in the small town of Namagpacan and went on to San Fernando next morning. Carriages were prepared for us at every village, and we traveled with the customary escort. At San Fernando we met Colonel Tino, commander of the military district embracing the provinces of North and South Ilocos, Union, Abra, Lepanto, Bontoc, and Benguet. This officer had received his commission as brigadier-general three days before our arrival; he is 21 years old.

We were received politely by this officer, but not cordially. He expressed several times his suspicion with regard to the object of our journey. He asked several times if we knew how to make maps and plans; also why we were not in uniform. We had sent word to this officer that we desired to visit the province of Benguet, taking the trail from San Fernando. He showed us an unsigned telegram purporting to be from the central government instructing him not to permit the American officers to reconnoiter any further in the district. For this reason he said he could not permit us to visit Benguet. We sent, through him, a telegram to the central government repeating our request and calling attention to their war department's order of October 20 regarding travelers. We were informed next morning by General Tino that our request had been refused. The reason given was that there were dangers on the trail. We accordingly left the town next morning, taking the road directly for Dagupan.

50. San Fernando is the capital city of the province of Union. It is a town of only three or four thousand inhabitants and is very limited in area, lying between the mountains and the sea. It is the port for the province of Union. We have seen trains of buffalo carts taking tobacco there for exportation. There were about twenty military officers in the town when we were there. Many of them are on General Tino's staff and are not regularly stationed in the town.

51. From San Fernando to Dagupan there were few significant or instructive incidents. We were never without a guard of soldiers. At the town of Baoang we met a German, Mr. Otto Sheerer, who had lived three years in the province of Benguet and was about to return there with his family. He said the trail was safe and could be traveled by horses. The Igorrotes of the province, according to his statement, are a very gentle people. These are the civilized Igorrotes, or Tingguines. At noon November 18 we arrived at Santa Tomas. The land between here and Dagupan is very low; the roads are heavy. We accordingly took a native sailboat for Parac, from that town to Dagupan. The natives, fearing to take their boat across the bar at Dagupan, we crossed that at San Fabian and proceeded to our destination through a protected inlet of the sea. Along our route there were great beds of nipa. This plant is of great value to the natives. Wines are made from the sap, and the leaves are used for thatching houses. We arrived at Dagupan that night, and at Manila November 20. We reported to the commanding officer of the Monadnock and next morning to the commander in chief.

52. The foregoing narrative of our journey is designed to give a general description of the country we passed through and of the methods of travel, and to illustrate by its incidents the character and grade of intelligence of its people and their attitude toward Americans, especially toward ourselves as military officers. The information we have acquired on certain points is summed up in the following paragraphs:

INTELLIGENCE AND EDUCATION OF THE NATIVES.

53. The Philippine officers, both military and civil, that we have met in all the provinces we have visited have, with very few exceptions, been men of intelligent appearance and conversation. The same is true of all those men who form the upper class in each town. The education of most of them is limited, but they appear to seize every opportunity to improve it. They have great respect and admiration for learning. Very many of them desire to send their children to schools in the United States or Europe. Many men of importance in different towns have told us that the first use to be made of the revenue of their government, after there is no more danger of war, will be to start good schools in every village. The poorer classes are extremely ignorant on most subjects, but a large percentage of them can read and write.

RELATION BETWEEN RICH AND POOR.

54. There is a very marked line between these two classes, and this has been broadened by the insurrection, for the reason that military officers must equip themselves without pay, and that civil officers have numerous expenses for which they receive no return. All officers, civil and military, have therefore been chosen from the richer class; and the political and military power of the provinces is in the hands of that class. The private soldiers are fed and clothed by the government and allowed a very small amount of spending money—in the western provinces 30 cents in silver per week.

ATTITUDE OF THE MILITARY TOWARD THE CIVIL CLASS.

55. In the provinces of the east that we have visited there appears to be little or no friction between the civil and military classes. Officers and privates, as far as we could observe, treat civilians with consideration. In the provinces of Ilocos Sur and Union there is a marked difference. The officers are more domineering. In traveling in these provinces we had many opportunities to observe this attitude. When accidents happened to our carriage, the officer commanding our escort called to our assistance every native in sight. When they did not answer his call promptly, we have seen him strike them with his riding whip. One man had a serious wound on his face where an officer had struck him with his pistol butt. He came to us for redress, after having appealed in vain to the military officer in command of the town. An order from Don Emilio Aguinaldo, dated October 18, 1898, calls the attention of his officers to the evils of this practice and orders them to correct it in themselves and to instruct all sergeants, corporals, and privates on the attitude they should maintain toward civilians.

DOMINION OF THE CHURCH.

56. In the provinces of Nueva Ictia, Nueva Vizcaya, Isabella, and Cagayan the native priests have no voice whatever in civil matters. The Catholic Church itself seems to have very little hold on the people of these provinces. Many men have expressed to us their preference for the Protestant Church. In Ilocos Sur and Union there are many more priests than in the other provinces mentioned. Every pueblo and barrio has its cura, and there are higher offices of the church in the larger towns. They appear to have an important influence in all civil matters.

POPULAR SENTIMENT REGARDING INDEPENDENCE.

57. Of the large number of officers, civil and military, and of leading townspeople we have met nearly every man has expressed in our presence his sentiment on this question. It is universally the same. They all declare they will accept nothing short of independence. They desire the protection of the United States at sea, but fear any interference on land. The question of the remuneration of our Government for the expense of establishing a protectorate is never touched upon. On the subject of independence there is, again, a marked difference between the four provinces first visited and those of Ilocos Sur and Union. In the former there is more enthusiasm—the sentiment is more of the people; in the latter it is more of the higher class and of the army. In these provinces we have seen signs of actual discontent with the existing state of things.

ATTITUDE TOWARD THE UNITED STATES.

58. There is much variety of feeling among the Philippines with regard to the debt of gratitude they owe to the United States. In every town we found men that said our nation had saved them from slavery, and others who claimed that without our interference their independence would have been recognized before this time. On one point they are united, however, viz, that whatever our Government may have done for them it has not gained the right to annex them. They have been prejudiced against us by the Spaniards. The charges made have been so numerous and so severe that what the natives have since learned has not sufficed to disillusion them. With regard to the record of our policy toward a subject people, they have received remarkable information on two points—that we have mercilessly slain and finally exterminated the race of Indians that were native to our soil, and that we went to war in 1861 to suppress an insurrection of negro slaves, whom we also ended by exterminating. Intelligent and well-informed men have believed these charges. They were rehearsed to us in many towns in different provinces, beginning at Malolos. The Spanish version of our Indian problem is particularly well known.

PREPAREDNESS FOR WAR.

59. The Philippine government has an organized military force in every province we have visited. They claim it extends also into Ilocos Norte, Abra, Lepanto, Bontoc, and Benguet. With regard to its existence in Ilocos and Benguet, we can speak with assurance.

We have met two officers with the rank of captain who are regularly stationed at Laoag, the capital city of Ilocos Norte, and also the commandante of the province of Benguet. The latter officer had come to San Fernando to obtain instructions from General Tino, and was about to return to Trinidad, the capital of that province. The number of troops under arms can only be given approximately. There are comparatively few in Nueva Ictia; an estimated number of not over 300. In the military district embracing the province of Nueva Vizcaya, Isabella, and Cagayan, Colonel Tirona, Commandante Leyba, and Commandante Villa agreed in giving the number of soldiers under arms actually as 2,000. An estimate, founded on the size of the garrisons in the towns we visited, would bring the number nearly up to that figure. In the western military districts the number of forces is about double that number, leaving out those stationed in the interior provinces of Abra, Lepanto, Bontoc, and Benguet, of which we know nothing positively. In the coast provinces of Ilocos Norte, Ilocos Sur, and Union a conservative estimate of the forces is 3,500. In most of the pueblos the garrison is but little larger than those in the towns of the western districts; but there are many barrios, each one of which has its guard of soldiers, never less than 12. In the eastern military district we met not more than 25 officers, and in the western district over 60. There are rifles enough for all, principally Remingtons, but many Mausers. In every cuartel there were at least as many rifles as there were soldiers in the garrison. The arms are more numerous in the eastern than in the western provinces. It is safe to estimate the number of rifles in the eastern district as at least twice the number of soldiers. Commandante Villa and other officers made the statement that 40,000 rifles were being distributed among the people of that district. We have seen no proof of this statement. Ammunition is said to be plentiful, and it appears so from the fact that the soldiers use it freely in hunting for deer. With regard to the total force of the Philippine army, actual and reserve, we can not speak from our own knowledge. Colonel Tirona claimed that 300,000 men from all the islands could be put in the field well armed; and several other officers have independently given the same figure. Every officer that we have seen carried a Spanish sword and revolver. They wear these weapons constantly, but regard them with contempt, preferring the bola at close quarters. The Philippina, which was at Aparri during our visit, carries two guns of a caliber of about 3 inches. These are the only guns we have seen, with the exception of two revolving cannons in the palacio at Malolos. We saw no fortifications. The Spaniards have left numerous stockades in the wilder regions, and the natives have built a few others. There are also numerous barricades thrown up during the insurrection. In the towns the Spaniards defended themselves in the houses for want of other protection. The military spirit pervades in the eastern district, where every town and barrio has organized companies of its children, which are drilled every day. In the western districts we did not see any children under arms. The officers have had no military education except that which they gained during the insurrection. Spanish drill tactics are used, and most of the officers are still studying the elementary text-book.

Respectfully submitted,

W. B. WILCOX,
Paymaster, U. S. N.

The following document has been translated in English and reprinted by the "Comité Central Filipino en el Extranjero," in virtue of instructions received from their government. Official editions of this correspondence have been forwarded through the post to the Presidents of both Houses:

To the honorable the members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The government of the Philippine republic being informed that it is the intention of the President of the United States to convene a meeting of the honorable members of Congress at a comparatively early date for the purpose of discussing and passing a resolution having for its object a just decision as to the policy to be pursued in reference to the present situation in the Philippines, I believe it to be consistent with the dictates of courtesy, as well as a duty to humanity, that in view of the fact that I have been intrusted with the portfolio of foreign affairs I should respectfully submit this document to you, setting forth the aspirations of the Filipino people and their reasons and justification for wishing to be recognized by your influential Government as an independent state.

Allow me, gentlemen, to lay before you, for your distinguished consideration, the facts and rights that form the grounds upon which the claim for recognition is made and sustained.

FIRST.

It is generally accepted as an axiom that as regards international affairs the larger and more powerful a state the greater is the obligation, morally, to support and maintain lesser states in the independence, the welfare, and the happiness with which God, in His bountiful goodness, has designed should be theirs and of which the greater states are guardians.

For instance, it appears evident that the powerful and wealthy nation which you, gentlemen, represent in Congress has been deputed by God to assist the weak Filipinos in the arduous and difficult task of restoration of their independence.

Eloquent proof of this is to be found in the cooperation offered and rendered to Don Emilio Aguinaldo in May, 1898, by the United States consuls at Hongkong and Singapore (Mr. Rounseville Wildman and Mr. E. Spencer Pratt) in order that our illustrious leader might continue the revolutionary war waged against Spain in 1896 and 1897, hostilities in connection with which were suspended under the provisions of the compact of Biencabato.

The cooperation referred to consisted of the facts that the United States dispatch boat McCulloch (attached to Admiral Dewey's squadron) conveyed Don Emilio Aguinaldo from Hongkong to Cavite, where he arrived on the 19th May, 1898; that Admiral Dewey received Don Emilio Aguinaldo with the ceremony and honors due to a general, in the presence of the whole of the officers and men of the flagship Olympia, and, besides, gave him 60 Spanish Mauser rifles to aid in a renewal of the revolution against Spain; that Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo was allowed to establish in Cavite—which was then held by the United States naval forces—the headquarters of the Filipino government, which commenced to exercise the functions of government on the 24th May, 1898, issuing therefrom a proclamation declaring war against Spain to wrest from her our independence. (Proclamation attached hereto.)

The letters of the aforesaid consuls, which are attached hereto for the information of the free and enlightened citizens of the United States, confirm the above statements.

Mr. Pratt, in one of his letters, says he congratulates himself on the rapid triumphs of Don Emilio Aguinaldo over the Spaniards, as it proves the wisdom of his judgment in recommending him to Admiral (then Commander) Dewey and the Government at Washington, and he added that he hoped to receive, when General Aguinaldo captured Manila, some historic memento of the place and of the incident, such as the flag or keys of the city or principal fortresses.

Consul-General Wildman, of Hongkong, instructed Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, in a letter attached hereto, respecting the treatment of Spanish prisoners, advising General Aguinaldo to give them only rice and water and treat the Spaniards "as they would treat you," advice which our humane leader declined to accept and act upon.

Thus in this wholly unexpected and unforeseen way bonds of good will and friendship were formed between Americans and Filipinos, resulting, as it well known, in the heroic and triumphant campaign of the Filipino army against the Spaniards, though it must be admitted, with due regard for the truth, that after the above-mentioned assistance and cordial cooperation our army received no more aid from the high officers of the United States, the Filipino army thereafter prosecuting the war against the Spanish land forces independently of any authority other than that exercised by our successful and brave leader, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, who, while directing the military operations with well-nigh miraculous skill and startling results, was also engaged in the task of organizing the Filipino national government on the model of Western nations, which are, admittedly, founders and leaders of modern civilization.

Thus it is plain that it was through providential agencies that the Filipino state came into being on the 24th day of May, 1898, and has existed to this day, replacing the alien Spanish Government which fell definitely on the 13th day of August, 1898, on which day our troops, which, in fact, and as set forth in Consul-General Pratt's letters, had closely invested Manila for more than two months, captured the suburbs of Manila, driving the Spaniards from their defenses, while the United States forces peacefully occupied the walled city in accordance with the terms of capitulation signed by the Spanish general.

It would seem, therefore, that there can be no doubt that God, in His infinite goodness, wisdom, and mercy, intrusted to the honor of the United States the liberation and independence of the Filipinos; but notwithstanding the evidence that the hand of Providence has guided the course of events, the United States are now endeavoring to prevent the consummation of the glorious and just purposes of the Creator. By whom, by what agency, were the two peoples united in the bonds of sympathy and friendship? Who could have prevented it?

Who is it that has caused these two friends and brethren to wage war upon one another? Alas! esteemed citizens of the great American Republic, you know well who is the cause of such reckless perturbation. It is the President of your Republic, Mr. William McKinley, who, using as a pretext alleged rights obtained through the purchase of the more than doubtful sovereignty of Spain, gives evidence of his intention to ignore the bonds of friendship and guardianship which should unite the two nations by imposing arms by force of arms, the sovereignty of the United States. Is this line of conduct of Mr. McKinley in harmony with the canons of morality simply because the American nation is greater, more opulent, and more powerful than the Filipino? Surely it is not, for if moral obligations, which bind parties to respect the generally accepted codes of morality, are applicable in international affairs, it is beyond question that there should be no evasion of obligation on the part of the great American nation to stand by and protect the small Filipino nation until the great work of securing the recognition of our existence as an independent nation is recognized and thereby firmly established—a great work to which your consuls (above mentioned) and commanders unquestionably and providentially applied themselves.

In the name, therefore, of Almighty God, of humanity, and of national honor, I now appeal to the great and influential citizens of the United States to fulfill these obligations, by passing, as a matter of paramount importance, a just resolution in your national Congress officially recognizing our independence, thereby bringing to an end this inhuman and wicked war and restoring the reign of peace and harmony between Americans and Filipinos, who, in accordance with the infallible will of God, should live under the happy conditions of brotherhood.

SECOND.

Accomplished facts are accepted in dealing with things political as rights unless the facts are at variance with the doctrines laid down in international law or the eternal principles of justice. Strictly in accordance with these incontrovertible principles the independence of the United States was realized and recognized in the last century.

In the same manner, and in more recent times, the Kingdom of Italy and the German Empire have come into existence, the ruling principle being, and the reason of it, that all men are born equal and possess inalienable rights of life, liberty, independence, and freedom in the pursuit of happiness.

Now, it is indisputable that we, the Filipinos, defeated the Spaniards, capturing 3,000 prisoners, and set up a republican government in the place of the one which had been vanquished. It is also beyond question that these accomplished facts have been recognized in a practical manner by the high officers who at that time, and since then, represented the United States in this archipelago, which is proved by the correspondence of our leader with Admiral (then Commander) Dewey and Generals Anderson, Merritt, and Otis, copies of which are attached hereto for the information of the citizens of the United States.

It is to be observed, in the first place, that in his first letter to Gen. Don Emilio Aguinaldo Admiral Dewey states that he has received with pleasure the documents forwarded to him by our distinguished leader, promising to transmit them to their respective destinations. The documents referred to are: The first proclamation issued by Gen. Don Emilio Aguinaldo announcing his arrival and the establishment of the dictatorial government at Cavite; also the proclamation of Philippine independence, issued in the town of Cavite, in the province of the same name—some to be forwarded to the United States Government in Washington and others to be forwarded to the representatives of the powers in Manila.

Secondly, it is to be noted that the Admiral in another letter asks General Aguinaldo for passports for several gentlemen recommended by the British consul, who was also acting consul for the United States of America in Manila, to enable them to travel freely and safely through our territory.

And, finally, it is noteworthy that Generals Anderson, Merritt, and Otis in their correspondence styled—as was only right and proper that they should—our leader “General Commanding the Philippine Revolutionary Army,” while General Anderson asked Gen. Don Emilio Aguinaldo for quarters and camping ground for the forces under his command, as well as other assistance and cooperation in the campaign against the Spaniards—our “common enemy.” It is also a well-known fact that the American commanders applied to us for positions and trenches for their troops in Maytubig so as to place their forces side by side with our troops in the siege of Manila. In fact, the records prove that everything was done in a manner that indicated full recognition of our triumphant revolution and the noble ends kept constantly in view, namely, our liberty and independence, and owing to which (the righteousness of our cause) the new Filipino State, by its just and irreproachable procedure, unquestionably merited the consideration and respect of the American commanders.

This explains how Admiral Dewey submitted for the disposition of Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo a protest lodged by the French consul in respect of the capture of the steamer Compania de Filipinas, which had been seized by us, the Admiral stating positively that he and his forces had nothing to do with the affair; held no jurisdiction in the premises.

In the light of the correspondence it is readily understood how Generals Anderson and Merritt came to address telegrams to Gen. Don Emilio Aguinaldo on the 13th of August, 1898 (the day on which our troops captured the whole of the suburbs of Manila and the Spaniards in the walled city capitulated to the forces of the United States), requesting General Aguinaldo to give instructions for his troops to evacuate the suburbs in order to avoid the dangers inseparable from a dual military occupation, and offering to negotiate with General Aguinaldo afterwards.

Lastly, it is quite comprehensible how General Otis came to appeal to General Aguinaldo in the name of the United States Government for the release of the friars held by us as prisoners—acts which show in an eloquent manner distinct recognition of the sovereign power and authority of the Philippine people, which had been recovered from the Spaniards since then and reassumed in the exalted and worthy personality of our leader, Gen. Don Emilio Aguinaldo.

Viewed from another standpoint the above-mentioned incidents might be held to indicate that they were clear evidence that it was the bounden duty of the American commanders to harass, and, if possible, quell the Philippine revolution, nor convey our illustrious leader to Cavite, to begin with, and thereby afford him very favorable opportunity (in view of the mode of conveyance, his reception by the Admiral, and the permission granted him to establish his headquarters in Cavite, whence he issued, without protest of any kind by Admiral Dewey or anyone else, a proclamation calling on the people to rally round his standard and wage war upon Spain to wrest from her the sovereignty of the archipelago) to revive the revolution against Spain, using his prestige and exercising his authority and genius to that end. But far from being indirect or ill-considered action, the recognition of General Aguinaldo's power and prestige, the arrangement to bring him back to the Philippines, the courtesy extended to him by Admiral Dewey, and the conduct of your consuls and generals was, on the contrary, rightful recognition of our revolution, in that our sovereign rights and independent authority in the archipelago was practically conceded and accepted as accomplished facts. It is therefore evident that we have a perfect right, and are not straining any points, in demanding from the Government of Washington official recognition of our independence, basing the demand on the above-mentioned reason that accomplished facts in affairs political constitute right.

This is altogether apart from and does not clash with the victories of your troops over the Spaniards, nor the cession of sovereignty by Spain in the treaty of Paris of the 10th of December last in favor of the United States.

As regards your victories, there are the proclamations of General Merritt and the letters of General Anderson clearly setting forth that America did not come to the Philippines to make conquests, much less to wage war against the natives, but to free the people from the galling yoke of Spain. “We came not as enemies, but as liberators.” Such were the solemn pledges of your Generals Merritt and Anderson to the Filipinos when they arrived in these islands.

Therefore it is plain that it can not be claimed that by reason of your victories over the Spaniards rights of conquest accrue to you as being due from the Filipinos for the all-sufficient reason that you were not engaged in war with us between the 1st of May, 1898, and the 4th of February, 1899, during the night of which latter date your forces, in accordance with the orders of President William McKinley, commenced hostilities against our forces for the purpose of establishing American sovereignty in our archipelago by force of arms.

As for the cession of sovereignty, I have to say it is a null and void agreement in every respect, for it has been celebrated in contravention of all rules of international law and in opposition to the eternal principles of justice.

For example: It is not moral, nor could it be just, and much less is it in accord with international right to say to a nation: “I will help you to sweep away Spanish sovereignty and make you independent, and after helping you to sweep away and destroy the said sovereignty I come and buy the sovereignty from Spain by title of cession and impose it by force of arms upon the protected people.”

Such a proceeding is self-condemnatory, for its accomplishment rests only with arbitrary power and in the power of anyone exercising such power and carrying it to the extent of injuring an ally or a friend to whom protection is offered. Fiore, Bluntschli, and Haller, authorities on international right, established as a rule to be universally applied the following: “It is not just under the pretext of assumed laws of nations to amalgamate or segregate a people against their obvious will spontaneously and voluntarily acclaimed.”

Therefore the cession in question is an act completely null and void, being neither moral nor just; nor is it even licit according to international law.

On the other hand, in respect of cessions the essential conditions include the possession of what is ceded, and when it concerns inhabited territories the concordance and express consent of the inhabitants is necessary. Neither of these conditions have been fulfilled in respect of the cession of the Philippines by the treaty of Paris of the 10th December, 1898. First, because at that date, and long before it, Spain exercised no sovereignty whatever over any Philippine territory, which was reconquered by us and governed by us since June, 1898, which facts were well known to the Governments of Washington and Madrid. Second, because the Philippine people had publicly and loyally manifested to the Government of Washington and to the whole world that it was their desire to live independently of all alien sovereignty; and perhaps on this account our wishes were not consulted when the cession was made. An act, without doubt, of bad faith on the part of the two contracting parties, who were perforce obliged to make the terms null and void by reason of this false step.

Consequently the treaty of Paris of 10th December, 1898, does not convey any sovereign rights whatever in favor of the United States over any of the Philippine Islands or its inhabitants. Nor are the United States in any way entitled by it to impose upon the Philippine people an alien sovereignty by force of arms.

The United States, therefore, can not be excused from recognizing our independence either on account of their victories over the Spaniards or by reason of the provisions of the treaty of Paris. We, however, readily admit that our gratitude and full recognition are due to the great North American nation for the generous assistance proffered us by their consular representatives and commanders in bringing from Hongkong to Cavite our illustrious leader to continue the rebellion against Spain, and then, by respecting that revolution, recognizing it as the sovereign power which replaced that which Spain had lost; but, from the fact of oppressing us and endeavoring to flinch from us our liberties, subjecting our independence, so dearly won, to the influence of a new foreign yoke there is a wide gulf fixed, which is as limitless as the distance to another world, and the only possible way to accomplish your object is to destroy the lives of 8,000,000 Filipinos—an act which would leave on the hitherto spotless pages of your glorious history and traditional liberality an everlasting and indelible stain.

THIRD.

The Filipinos can justly boast of a social status on a par with cultured peoples and are fit to commingle and live on an equality with civilized nations, forming in common with them part of the magna civitas.

We are a community of 8,000,000 people politically organized on well-defined territory, with our own government, which is competent to and sufficient for the protection of the rights of our citizens and capable of assuming full responsibility for our acts in the conduct of relations with other states. We have an official language—Spanish. We have accepted an enlightened religion—the Roman Catholic faith. Strict morality, which emanates from christianizing influences, governs our manners and customs. Our laws are on a par with statutes of other civilized states, being identical with those in operation in these islands during the last few years, which have been generally accepted as meeting the requirements of civilized communities. And, lastly, we live in families, in towns, and in cities, affording permanent evidence of a status of cultured and civilized society; it being universally conceded that the Philippines, unlike other far eastern states, have invariably extended hospitality to all foreigners and enjoy the reputation of exceptional faultlessness and the strongest aversion to anything in the nature of barbarous conduct.

We, the Filipinos, respect life, honor, and rights in property, and punish with severe penalties all violations of these governing principles of humanity. We also have laws encouraging the knowledge of science and arts, protecting industries, commerce, and agriculture, and we profess, finally, our acquaintance with all the most noble sentiments of friendship, gratitude, and honesty.

We possess, therefore, all the conditions requisite for existence as an independent state according to article 37 of the International Code of the famous jurisconsult Fiore, and that being so, we are perfectly justified in demanding from all the great civilized states official recognition of our independence in conformity with articles 44, 48, and 49 of the said standard work, which provides, moreover, that such recognition can not, under the circumstances, be denied us, nor should it be unduly delayed. It is clearly set forth in articles 55 and 56 of Fiore's work that any course of procedure in contravention of the foregoing articles is opposed to the principle of high policy.

To better prove to the people of the United States our culture and state of civilization there are annexed to this document copies of our fundamental laws and various decrees relating to the establishment of our executive and judicial administration, our educational establishments, and our army regulations. In this way, perhaps, the people of the States will be better able to grasp the truth respecting our advancement along the highroad of modern civilization and be thereby convinced of our ability to rule and govern ourselves in an independent manner.

These are the reasons why we appeal for official recognition of our independence—reason which we confidently submit to the deep conscientiousness and of the enlightened people of the United States—a people destined by God to decide the fate of our unfortunate country—a fate which would be better if, heeding the dictates of justice and humanity, your President, Mr. McKinley, had not chosen to wage this cruel, devastating war against us with your powerful land and sea forces.

It is sometimes said that we are to blame for the outbreak of hostilities during the night of the 4th February last, but this is not an established fact.

In the first place, because we, the Filipinos, were expecting at that very time (the beginning of February) official recognition of our independence from the Government of Washington, an expectation which was justified by the annexed letter of Gen. E. S. Otis, dated 25th January; also on account of what took place at the conferences of the mixed commissions of Americans and Filipinos, which sat in Manila during the latter part of the said month of January to discuss matters and arrange for a basis of friendly relations between the two parties, which, it was hoped, would be permanent. Moreover, there was another reason, namely, the Filipinos were fully aware of the superior strength of your forces, against whom it would have been criminal folly to pit our inexperienced and undisciplined army.

Accordingly, it is unquestionable that we were not the aggressors, for we knew full well that we were to act on the offensive we could look for neither military nor political gain of any kind. On the contrary, we regarded such action as bordering on suicidal folly and well-nigh sure to bring down on us the hatred and contempt of the American people. We had, in fact, nothing to gain and very much to lose by aggression.

Esteemed citizens of the United States, if with the foregoing reasoning there be borne in mind the fact that we were living in peace and harmony with your forces since June, without the smallest intention or inclination to commence hostilities, at a period when your forces were smaller and therefore more easy to cope with than subsequently, I verily believe that the enlightened people of the United States will not be slow to realize that it is not in the least degree probable, nor is it reasonable to assume that we were the aggressors, seeing that we stood in need of their good will and were anxious to court and maintain a favorable impression with the American electorate in the interest of our cause. Peace and good will were essential to the success of our cause—a cause which would at once be jeopardized by any overt act of aggression.

We are neither celebrated warriors nor great fighters; nor are we as quixotic as the Spaniards. We took up arms to obtain our independence, and it is self-evident that we did not develop our little armed force for the purpose of making an enemy of such a great and mighty people as the citizens of the United States in order that thereby our noble cause might the more easily triumph.

If we call to mind the fact that your President, Mr. McKinley, caused reinforcements to be sent to Manila after the capitulation by Spain on the 30th

August, 1898, if we remember his refusal to listen to our humble petition to him, praying for recognition of our independence through our representative, Don Felipe Agoncillo, whom he refused to receive, or whether we recall the fact that he refused to give ear unto our appeal through the good offices of General Otis, as is proved by a letter from the General and the (omission in copy) to; and if we take into consideration that, lastly and finally, the treaty of Paris was so framed as to involve the cession of the sovereignty of Spain to the United States, I am of opinion that the most natural sequence of these incontestable moves of Mr. McKinley is to be found in the outbreak of hostilities, namely, an order from your President to General Otis to commence with acts of aggression and impose on us that odious sovereignty by force of arms, notwithstanding the fact that we had demonstrated and made it evident in every possible way from the first that we would accept no solution other than our independence.

You, honorable representatives of the people of the United States, having in view the providential bonds which bind the fate of the Philippines to your supreme decision, surely you will not be unmindful at such a momentous epoch of the sublime principles of right and justice proclaimed by the illustrious founders of your independence on 4th June, 1776. Endowed with those magnificent principles your nation advanced rapidly along the paths of progress till it became great and powerful, admired and respected by all the aged states of Europe.

Trusting, therefore in your glorious traditions of humanity and liberality, the Filipinos look forward with confidence to obtaining from your acknowledged rectitude a just resolution officially recognizing the independence of our beloved country.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, yours, very respectfully,

TARLAC, P. I., 26th August, 1899.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana desire any disposition of the joint resolution which was laid on the table at his request, subject to his call?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it be referred—

Mr. SPOONER. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very good; let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the joint resolution will lie on the table.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to call up the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. The bill was read yesterday, I believe, and it is now open to amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I have an amendment in my hands which I ask the Clerk to read and the chairman of the committee to accept, if he will, as an amendment to the bill. I do not know where it ought to come in, but I suppose at the end of section 2 would be as well as anywhere else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois submits an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 2, on page 3, the following proviso:

Provided, That the Director of the Census may, in his discretion, collect statistics relating to all the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restriction in this section relating to special classes.

Mr. CULLOM. That was meant to apply to section 8 of the original act, which I have not here, and I should like to have it inserted in some part of the pending bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this amendment is a very simple one, and it appears somewhat ungracious to oppose its insertion in the bill, but we are confronted by a policy which will lead to an indefinite expansion of the census work and a repetition of the misfortunes and delays that have attended like efforts in the past. No one is better informed than the Senator from Illinois concerning the many difficulties that have been encountered in previous attempts to cover too large a field in connection with the census inquiries.

When this bill for the census was originally framed the Senate in no uncertain terms expressed itself in favor of a census so limited as to enable us to secure the results within a reasonable period of time. In conformity with that purpose, the census, as stated upon yesterday, was divided into two parts. By section 7 we undertook to provide for the regular decennial census. That section provides for only four topics of inquiry—the population, agriculture, manufacturing, and vital statistics—mortality record. This identical purpose found favor elsewhere, but it was assumed, and correctly, too, that in the course of time inquiries concerning other matters would be of public importance, and we therefore provided in the next section, section 8, that immediately upon the conclusion of the decennial census the Census Office should proceed through special agents and other methods aside from the regular enumerators to collect data upon a number of important questions concerning which statisticians and legislators and others have much interest.

During the consideration of the bill here presented numerous persons have appeared before the committee endeavoring to have the work contemplated as supplemental work, to be taken up after the census was completed, imported into the census work provided for in section 7 of the bill. Professor Bell, who has given much attention to the subject-matter of the Senator's amendment, appeared before the committee and in most eloquent terms urged the committee to incorporate the proposed amendment in the bill being framed at that time by the committee. The committee, after full consideration of the matter, not, I am sure, minimizing the importance of the subject, but determined to adhere to a policy which we deemed necessary in order to make a success of this census in the matter of time, unanimously determined not to have this feature incorporated in the regular census work. In view of that determination by the committee, I feel constrained to object to this amendment.

In this connection I wish to appeal to the Senate, desiring, as I know Senators do, to have this census work completed in an effective and expeditious manner, to adhere to the policy inaugurated when the original legislation was approved. If we depart from that policy in one particular, we shall be compelled to depart from it in many particulars. The experience of the past is quite sufficient to admonish us of the danger involved in any single departure. As suggested by the Senator from South Carolina yesterday, and the suggestion was not overdrawn, tons upon tons of schedules that had gone through the hands of the enumerators at a cost not of $500,000, as suggested by the Senator, but at an expense involving millions of dollars to the Government, were taken out as rubbish and burned because it was found utterly impossible to tabulate the statistics to be deduced from the material put together, and what was left unburned required in the neighborhood of eight long, painful years to put into book form for the use of the public.

Mr. President, at the opening of this century we should adhere to the departure made when the bill was framed, to have, as the Senator from Maine says, a quick census. We desire to know how many people there are in this country. We desire to know what progress has been made in agriculture and manufacturing lines. We desire to know essential things concerning vitality and mortality statistics. The bill now covers only those propositions requiring for complete information house-to-house canvass. Where, by or through correspondence or special agents or inquiries conducted in that manner, statistics can be collated, it is needless and therefore vicious to undertake to burden the enumerators with the task of collecting the data.

I sincerely hope that this amendment will fail, not because it is lacking in merit, for it is as meritorious as the proposition of the Senator from South Dakota or the very wise suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, two additional amendments which, I assume, in the course of this discussion, will be offered to this bill, but it is objected to because it will so encumber this work as to defeat the purpose Congress had originally, in attempting to confine the census to the simple propositions involved in population, agriculture, manufacturing, and vital statistics.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. If the amendment should be adopted, it perhaps ought to read "and be it provided," so as to make it a part of the bill with any sort of connection.

Mr. President, I am certainly not one of those who desire to interfere with the rapid taking of the census. I have some knowledge of the censuses heretofore taken, having been on the committee most of the time, and I know that there has been great delay, in part consequent upon changes in the law after the work had begun. Just a few moments ago I came into possession of this amendment, and I really did not know the status of the bill until after I received it from a gentleman of this city. It is the result of resolutions which I find in a magazine entitled The Associations Review, from which I will read.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Illinois a question before he proceeds, so that I may understand him? The subject of this amendment is not provided for in section 8?

Mr. CULLOM. Of the original act?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; where it provides in reference to the feeble-minded, deaf, dumb, and blind.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know what the provision of the law is. Mr. CARTER. That, I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts, is a provision in reference to the supplemental work. This matter is taken care of in that section.

Mr. HALE. Entirely.

Mr. CARTER. And will be regularly disposed of, but subsequent to the taking of the census.

Mr. HOAR. My amendment merely amends the provision about supplemental work. It does not bring anything forward from the deferred to the immediate.

Mr. CARTER. There is no objection to an amendment to section 8.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I proposed.

Mr. CULLOM. This amendment was proposed to section 8 of the present law as it was sent to me.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, who knows more about it than I do, but, as I understand it, there are two classes of census work provided for in the bill which is now the law. One is that which relates to the quick census of which the Senator spoke, and then there are others to be done after the first is completed; and that will be attended to. I supposed the Senator's purpose was to transfer this matter from class second to class first. If it is not even in class second now—

Mr. HALE. It is. It is all in class second.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment was handed to me, and it was proposed to make it an amendment to section 8 by adding to it the following proviso:

Provided, That the Director of the Census may, in his discretion, collect statistics relating to all the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restriction in this section to special classes.

I submit to the chairman of the committee, in view of the fact that this is proposed to be an amendment to section 8, whether he has any objection to it.

Mr. HOAR. It is there now.

Mr. CULLOM. It is there now in a way, but it certainly is not satisfactory to those who are interested especially in this subject.

Mr. HALE. How can he have it much better than this:

That after the completion and return of the enumeration of the work upon schedules—

We kept that line of demarcation clear all the way through—relating to the products of agriculture, etc., the Director of the Census is hereby authorized to collect statistics relating to special classes—

We kept them out of the first enumeration because it embarrasses the census—including the insane, feeble-minded, deaf, dumb, and blind; to crime, pauperism, and benevolence, including prisoners, paupers, juvenile delinquents, and inmates of benevolent and reformatory institutions; to deaths and births in registration areas; to social statistics of cities; to public indebtedness.

And so forth.

All of those things which not only embarrass the first census, the immediate census, what I have called the quick census, but which can be better done by special agents. If the Senator will think a moment he will see that this delicate matter of intruding upon a family and reporting that it has in it one or two insane persons or idiotic persons is not a thing that ought to be done by enumerators.

Mr. CULLOM. Suppose that is true—

Mr. HALE. It should be done by special agents, as provided for in section 8.

Mr. CULLOM. This is proposed as an amendment to section 8 of the original act, about which the Senator is talking. Whether it enlarges the work so as to make it desirable I am not prepared to say, as I am not familiar with section 8, and I call upon the chairman of the committee to say whether this amendment adds anything to the real work desired by the people who are interested in this special subject.

Mr. CARTER. It adds in this respect, in answering the Senator's query directly. The section as at present existing contemplates only the enumeration of persons in institutions.

Mr. CULLOM. Oh.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment contemplates going beyond the institutions, which can only be done, I assume, through the enumerators; and that is the real purpose of the amendment, I think.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CARTER. That fixes upon the Director of the Census a burden which he can not discharge unless by virtue of a schedule delivered to every enumerator who goes forth. I will suggest in that particular, with the permission of the Senator—

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. That one of the most difficult problems with which the last Director had to contend was found in this inquiry relating to the feeble-minded and the classes, so to speak.

Mr. CULLOM. There certainly ought to be information on that subject in the census. I desire to read the resolutions that were adopted by the association at the summer meeting at Northampton:

Whereas it appears that no provision has been made for an enumeration of the blind, or of the deaf, commonly known as "deaf and dumb," or "deaf-mutes," in the census of 1900; and

Whereas the enumeration hitherto made and returns tabulated for every decennial census since the year 1880 have been especially useful, valuable, and interesting to the educators of these classes, and have undoubtedly resulted in extending the blessings of an education to large numbers of the blind and of the deaf; and

Whereas the enumeration of these classes is a matter of great importance to the blind and to the deaf, and to those who are seeking their welfare: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That Dr. Alexander Graham Bell, president of the American Association to Promote the Teaching of Speech to the Deaf, and four others shall constitute a committee on behalf of this association with full power to take such steps as may be necessary to secure an enumeration of the blind and of the deaf and of the deaf blind in the next census. This committee is requested to confer with the Hon. William B. Merriam, Director of the Census, and Dr. Fred H. Wines, assistant director, in order to secure under the existing law, if possible, an enumeration of the classes herein referred to upon schedules which shall include at least the name, residence, age, parents' names in cases of minors, sex, race, and age at which deafness or blindness occurred.

If it shall appear that an amendment to the law is necessary in order to secure the enumeration aforesaid, this committee is hereby requested and empowered to appear before the proper officers of the United States Government and committees of Congress of the United States and to make use of every endeavor to secure a proper amendment of the law.

While it may be somewhat embarrassing to take the statistics of the unfortunates, yet I hardly feel willing that they shall be omitted. I am sure I do not want to embarrass this bill or the prompt taking of the census for 1900, but it seems to me that the wishes of the people who represent these two unfortunate classes ought to be complied with if it can be done. Now, if, as the chairman suggests, the provisions of the act in section 8 apply only to those in institutions, it is only a partial census and does not cover the ground as it ought to be covered. If we can amend the law in some way so as to take them all in, if we undertake to take in any of them, I shall be satisfied, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HOAR. This amendment leaves it to the discretion of the Director of the Census?

Mr. CULLOM. It does. It provides that in the discretion of the Director of the Census this shall be done, and I understand—I do not know whether it is true—that he has provided a more enlarged amendment, but it was the desire of these people, especially such as Dr. Bell and others, that they should embarrass the committee as little as possible, and so they contracted it to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. CARTER. I will state, Mr. President, that the Director of the Census indicated that he would not strenuously object to this addition; but at the same time he announced that the population schedules were all printed, and therefore a separate schedule would have to be printed and delivered to every enumerator in order to collate this information. I believe that after this decennial census shall have been completed the Bureau may more effectively acquire this information by addressing letters to all the practicing physicians in the United States than they can by undertaking to collect the information through enumerators. The name and address of every physician practicing medicine on the continent can be readily obtained, and a letter addressed to each will secure information on this and other delicate subjects of like character more effectively and, I think, in a more satisfactory manner than can be acquired by the enumerators.

Mr. CULLOM. I dislike very much to embarrass the committee or to cause the incurring of any extraordinary expense. Do I understand that these schedules are all printed?

Mr. CARTER. The population schedules are printed.

Mr. HOAR. May I say one word at this point?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I can not for the life of me see why everything for which the Senator from Illinois asks is not now provided for in the bill, and substantially in his language.

Mr. CULLOM. The chairman of the committee thinks not.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see why the old law does not answer. Perhaps I may be mistaken. Let us see. This information is to be obtained after the completion and return of the enumeration and of the work upon the schedules relating to the products of agriculture, and so on. Then the Director of the Census is especially authorized "to collect statistics relating to special classes, including the insane, feeble-minded, deaf, dumb, and blind." That is the only limit in relation to those in asylums. The Bureau is also to collect statistics relating "to crime, pauperism, and benevolence, including prisoners, paupers, juvenile delinquents, and inmates of benevolent and reformatory institutions."

Therefore it is not going to delay your present census, because it is not to be done until after that has been completed. It is not going to be confined to persons in asylums, because the Director, in his discretion, can make it general, and it is to be assumed that he will do it in a humane and decent way. Nobody can doubt that.

It seems to me the objections which have been made to the amendment of my honorable friend from Illinois are objections to the original law, and that everything in his amendment is in the law now, I think, without exception.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me to read that way, I confess, but the chairman of the committee indicated that it only applied to those in institutions.

Mr. KENNEY. If Senators will recur to section 8 of the law, they will find that it reads:

The statistics of special classes and of crime, pauperism, and benevolence specified in this section shall be restricted to institutions containing such classes.

There is the limitation.

Mr. CULLOM. But that is taken out.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is no good at all.

Mr. CULLOM. A census of a portion of such classes is taken and the balance left out. If they are not included, it would not be anything like a proper census. So I should like to have my amendment added to section 8 of the law.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I wish that Senators would refrain from offering amendments enlarging the scope of the census to this purely administrative bill. I can understand that the subject of enlarging the scope of the census is a proper one to bring before the Census Committee and before Congress; but this bill was drawn up as a purely administrative bill, and the Director of the Census needs this bill now in order to go on with his work.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me to ask him a question, does he think that taking this census, including only the unfortunates who are in institutions and leaving all the remainder out, is a proper census?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, Mr. President.

Mr. CULLOM. Then how are you going to amend it?

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will listen to me, I will tell him what my notion is, and I shall be very glad to have half a dozen Senators on the floor aiding me, all at the same time. [Laughter.]

The object of the Senator's amendment is to transfer the taking of the census of the deaf, dumb, and blind from the special agents to the enumerators. I understand that to be his object. Is it not his object?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is, I want to speak against it.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care how the committee provides for taking that census so that it is taken properly, fully, and effectually. If the committee can so frame the bill as that in the end all these people may be counted as indicated in the amendment, that is all I desire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am willing for one that that shall be done, but I do not want it done on the population schedule, and therefore I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator. But I was addressing myself to the general question.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator got the amendment there? If so, I inquire how does it read? Will not the Senator read it?

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been amended since it was offered, I think.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment was suggested for the purpose of perfecting the bill. The amendment reads as follows—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course when a Senator is making a speech it is not of the slightest sort of importance what the proposition is upon which he is speaking. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. That may be so in some cases, but the Senator from New Hampshire always talks upon the direct proposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will yield to the Senator from Montana to have the proposition stated.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment reads as follows:

Provided further, That the Director of the Census may, in his discretion, collect statistics relating to all of the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restrictions in this section relating to special classes.

Mr. HALE. Suppose you put in there, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, that under the provisions of section 8 the Director may do this.

Mr. CHANDLER. That will be proper, and that is probably what was intended by the Senator from Illinois in the amendment as it now reads, or by the learned gentleman who induced him to undertake its advocacy. It does, in terms, introduce this subject into the enumeration schedule. So I now understand the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that if that is put in as an amendment to section 8, and then the subsequent section is so amended as to allow this census to be taken not only of those classes in institutions, but outside of them, it will answer my purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Personally, I have no objection to that, but what I was pleading for was that upon this purely administrative bill we should not enlarge the scope of the census. I think the subject is a proper one to be considered by the Committee on the Census and by Congress, and it is probable that some enlargements will be made, but they should be made carefully, they should not be made upon the impulse of the moment, but every one of them should be examined by the Committee on the Census, and there should be action taken upon them deliberately and in order. That can not be done, Mr. President, if amendments enlarging the scope of the census are to be adopted to this purely administrative bill.

I would like to have Senators consent to withhold amendments until the administrative bill is disposed of, then offer their propositions, let them go to the Committee on the Census, and have them considered in order, for if we begin this way, upon the motion of a single Senator to enlarge the scope of the census upon this administrative bill, there is no knowing where we shall stop.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows, does he not, that this is not in the least a new matter. The committee has had hearings on this very subject, and has had eminent persons before it. It has gone over the whole matter carefully, without any prejudice, and rejected the proposition, because its members thought it would interfere with the scope of the work. Now it is the fashion, and gentlemen have the right to follow it, after they are overruled in committee on full examination, to apply to a Senator and insist that he shall offer the proposition; and he offers it as new matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will allow me to go on.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is not so much this particular amendment, but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] wants to enlarge the scope of section 8 so as to include an investigation into the water power of New England, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]—I call the attention of the members of the committee to this—has an amendment which he proposes to offer, to have an investigation made into the subject of the distribution of the wealth of this country, and that, as is the case relating to the water power, is a very proper subject of investigation. It is certainly a proper subject of statistical inquiry. It may possibly be something which the Census Bureau ought to take up; but all these propositions ought to be considered by a committee of the Senate before they are acted upon. We ought not to adopt one of them after another upon this administrative bill.

When the bill for the present census was being prepared, it was found to be of the highest importance—and I can add nothing on the subject to what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said yesterday—to so frame the bill as to reduce the size of the volumes of the next census and to limit the work of the enumerators. It appeared upon inquiry that ten years ago the enumerators who went around to take the population census had to make a very large number of inquiries. The then chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine, will remember, I think, that two or three hundred inquiries had to be made in every family, and it was thought proper that the subjects as to which the enumerators, who have but a week or a fortnight in which to do their work and make inquiries, should be reduced somewhere down to 100.

The number of inquiries which they are to make is too large now, Mr. President. But by strenuous effort the committee set their faces against too wide a scope for the census, and the number of inquiries that these enumerators are to make next June was reduced from two or three hundred down to between one and two hundred; and the number was too large then. It was also found that we could probably have the volumes of the census of 1890, numbering 24, reduced to 5 or 6 in 1900. It was with quite a great effort and with considerable self-denial and after quite a debate that the determination was arrived at to thus reduce and limit the scope of the census for 1900. I hope we shall not go on little by little and undo that work and pile upon the Director of the Census the duty of adding innumerable items to the subjects which are to be investigated until you will have again a census of 24 volumes and a census which would be so bulky that it would be comparatively useless.

It is entirely certain that we can not afford to go on and convert our Census Office into a general statistical office for the country. The further the census has got from a mere enumeration of the inhabitants the more expensive it has become, the more complicated it has become, and I will not say, although I am inclined to say it, the more useless it has become because of its great bulk and of the extensive researches into which the investigators have been led.

I am opposed to any enlargement of the scope of the census upon this bill, and I hope all amendments to it will be voted down. I trust, if Senators want to enlarge the scope of the census, they will offer bills for that purpose and have them referred to the committee and fully examined.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the statistics of these unfortunate classes are of very great value, and care ought to be taken that a census of these classes should be somehow thoroughly taken. I find in the existing act that the enumerators are to take account of only those persons who are in institutions.

Mr. CULLOM. More than half of such persons are outside of institutions.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, more than half of them are outside. They have gone into schools and are living in various ways and in various places. The statistics on that subject will not be worth one farthing, and the census authorities will not get half the number of the deaf, dumb, and blind there are in the country. It is not the way of getting at them by simply calling at the buildings where they may be confined. They can furnish the census of those in the institutions, of course, and may know where some of their graduates are. If the Senator in charge of this bill will strike out the limitation as to institutions only and will accept the proposed amendment, the work will be done. That is all I care about. I do not care how it is done, but I wish he would try to have it done.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let that be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will be read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before that is done, I suggest to the chairman of the committee and to the Senator from Illinois that the object both of them are desirous of obtaining may be reached by omitting in the eighth section the prohibition in regard to the census of these unfortunate classes, which provides that only those who are in institutions shall be enumerated. If you will strike out that provision, you will then allow the special agents to gather these facts after the first census is taken. You will not hamper the population census and the important work of the Census Bureau, but you will leave this data, which is valuable only to scientists and to some few people who are interested in such matters, to be collected by special agents, by striking out the words which confine those inquiries to those unfortunates who are in institutions, but leaving it open to the Director to get them wherever they are to be found. Then you accomplish the work which the Senator from Illinois seems to desire and do not hamper the census authorities.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, one of the difficulties connected with the suggestion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] will be found in this. It is properly the desire of Congress to keep within the limits of reason the work to be accomplished by any bureau of the Government which incurs expense. With that restriction removed, the Bureau of the Census would be commissioned to go beyond institutions and to inquire into the question of the criminal classes of the country, if you please, who are not in institutions, to examine police-court records, and to tabulate information that might or might not be of value. The same would be true with relation to juvenile delinquents and all those classes, save and except the blind, the deaf, and the dumb. In some instances these unfortunates are outside of institutions. The criminal classes, according to the theory of our law, are all within institutions, either reformatory or penal. It seems better to make the exception in the form presented by the Senator's amendment rather than to remove all restriction relative to the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was only endeavoring to meet both points.

Mr. CARTER. I will state generally, Mr. President, and I think it will be concurred in by all of the committee, that it was the purpose of the committee to provide in this section 8 for a line of special work which would cover every necessary and reasonable investigation that Congress might deem it wise to hereafter authorize the Census Bureau to prosecute. The desire of the committee is that the section preceding section 7, which provides for the enumeration, shall not be overburdened and overloaded, so as to defeat the object of the census from the beginning. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "may," at the end of line 1, the words "after the completion of the census as aforesaid;" so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided further, That the Director of the Census may, after the completion of the census as aforesaid, in his discretion, collect statistics relating to all the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restriction in this section relating to special classes.

Mr. CULLOM. If that is adopted, it will cover the particular subject.

Mr. CARTER. I think, instead of the words "this section," which would refer to the section of the bill in which this amendment appears, it should be "notwithstanding the restriction contained in section 8 of the act of March 3, 1890."

Mr. CULLOM. That is the suggestion I was going to make. I feared the restriction in section 8 would defeat its object. If there is no objection to that, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. The only objection I have is that it is enlarging the scope of the census; and if we have to deal with this subject, we shall have half a dozen others.

Mr. CULLOM. It is left entirely in the discretion of the Director of the Census.

Mr. CHANDLER. But this administrative bill ought to be passed without reopening the question of enlarging the scope of the next census.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think we can be trusted, in view of that advice, not to encumber this bill with other amendments. If we do right in this case, we may do wrong in the other cases if we choose.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] overlooks the way we legislate and have to legislate in the Senate. I suppose if we took up regularly and in order and in the best way all business which comes to us we could not do one year's legislation in ten. We have to take such imperfect opportunities as we can get to make our attempts to procure legislation which is desired when the general subject is up. Now, if we should send these amendments, which everybody agrees, I think, ought to be made, to the committee, the chances are that they would bring in a report, perhaps at the shortest, in six weeks from now. Then they would have a fight all the rest of the session, with at least ten other subjects all seeking the attention of the Senate. The result would be that these simple and clear amendments would have against them, probably not only the members of the Senate who are opposed to them, but the members of the Senate who want other subjects considered.

Here is a simple thing. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] stated that it could be put into the eighth section, and that he had no objection to it. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] stated that he had no objection to it. Both of them so stated in regard to my amendment, which was merely an interpretation of the law relating to the statistics of manufactures, so that the inquiries should include the subject of water power, a matter about which the Commissioner of the Census is in some doubt. It seems to me these two or three matters should be put in the bill.

Then, when it comes to the matter of the statistics of wealth, that is something which we will not deal with until it is explained; at least, I hope not. That we shall need the statistics upon some of these subjects no one questions, and it should be provided for, if it can be done, in this eighth section. The other amendments had the assent of representatives of the committee, who regard them as good things in themselves, and I do not think we ought to go without them on the chance that we may get up another census bill a few months hence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] as it has been modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2, on page 3, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That the Director of the Census may, after the completion of the census as aforesaid, in his discretion, collect statistics relating to all the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restriction contained in section 8 of the act of March 3, 1890, relating to special classes.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] seems to be exceedingly earnest in the advocacy of this amendment, as do some other Senators. I do not consider it a very material amendment; I do not consider it a very important amendment. There are other amendments which, if this shall be agreed to, ought to be adopted, which I consider infinitely more important to the great masses of the toiling millions of this country than this amendment. I understood, however, when the last census bill was reported and passed, with a good deal of unanimity, that we were going to stand by it, that we would have a census taken in pursuance of it, and that we would not be, from the day the bill passed until five or six years afterwards, amending, enlarging, and extending it until the publication of the census would be a disgrace to any government.

I insist that we shall stand by the act as it was passed, and take the census which it provided for. If it is desired to have any other census taken, it can be taken. We are not confined to taking a census every ten years. We have, under the Constitution, to take one every ten years, but we can take a census at any time; so we need not encumber this bill with amendments. Why mix this up? We have not, I believe, received all the reports of the last census. I think in the last year some of the volumes came in.

Mr. CULLOM. I assume that the Senator from Missouri does not desire a partial census of those unfortunates to whom my amendment refers, but a whole census, with all the facts.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the census will be complete enough for any man to form a just conclusion from. Though it may not include every such person found in some private home, it will have all those in institutions.

Mr. CULLOM. The census will contain simply the enumeration of those in the institutions, and no others.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say that that will include 999 out of every 1,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. CULLOM. I differ with the Senator very materially.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am only stating what the amendment will do. I do not think it a very important amendment. There will simply be a few whose names will not be taken in the census, but that will not be fatal to it and will not injure the reputation or character or standing of our nation; it will not prohibit anybody from obtaining information, and all the information on that subject that is worth a continental cent.

Mr. CULLOM. We might say that none of it is worth a continental, but when we come to take a census of any class of people let us have an enumeration of all in that class. If that is not to be done, we ought to strike out the original provision of the law.

It seems to me the Senator is entirely wrong in the position he takes. This amendment will not interfere with the population census at all. It simply provides that the census of all of these two unfortunate classes shall be taken, not only those in institutions, but those who are not in institutions, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 9, noes 22.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum has not voted.
Mr. HOAR. I rise to move that the Senate adjourn.
Mr. ELKINS. Before that is done, I desire to present some papers in the nature of morning business.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not do any business in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ELKINS. I merely want to present some papers and bills, so as to get them out of my charge.

Mr. HOAR. That can not be done now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 10, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 10, 1900.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou in whose hand our breath is and whose are all our ways, as the Senate meets to-day to pay its tribute of respect and affection to the memory of our late beloved Vice-President, a man whose generous nature, sunny temper, and friendly ways endeared him to all who were brought in contact with him, grant that the men who speak may set forth the feeling not only of the Senate, but of the whole country.

Hear our devout prayer in behalf of the wife who has been widowed, and of the son who has been rendered fatherless. Uphold and steer them in their unspeakable bereavement. And let this great sorrow, which has touched so many homes and hearts, come to us with the sense that there is a future where God's sons and daughters are gathered in immortal peace and blessedness, where are no tears, nor sorrow, nor grief. We pray through Jesus Christ, our Saviour. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

NAVAJO INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, dated the 5th instant, with accompanying papers, expressing an urgent necessity for the enlargement of the Navajo Indian Reservation, in Arizona, to enable these Indians to support themselves by stock raising within the limits of their reservation.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

Washington, January 10, 1900.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION ACT OF MARCH 9, 1898.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, certain information relative to that portion of the $50,000,000 appropriated by Congress under the act approved March 9, 1898, making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and stating that no portion of the amount was assigned to and expended by or under the direction of the Department of Justice.

What disposition does the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] desire to have made of the communication?

Mr. ALLEN. I move that it be printed, with the accompanying papers, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK BANK TRANSACTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, copies of all letters, communications, agreements, papers, and documents between the Treasury Department of the Government of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York.

The papers are quite voluminous. The Chair supposes they should be referred to the Committee on Finance. Perhaps the question of printing should be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ALLISON. Do all those documents accompany the communication?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the documents are connected with it.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it in response to the resolution I introduced some days ago?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think it is.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand it is in response to the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. Those papers seem to be rather voluminous. I suppose they are letters and documents.

Mr. ALLEN. They ought to be printed. Their value, I suppose, consists in being printed and made public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule they would go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE. That committee can report at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Senate can order the printing without a reference.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate can order the printing. I hope they will be ordered printed.

Mr. ALLEN. I trust they will be ordered printed without a reference of the question.

Mr. ALLISON. Let them be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST. Is there any statement there by the Secretary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is quite a long statement from the Secretary.

Mr. ALLEN. That should be printed as a part of the document.

Mr. VEST. Yes, if it is too long to be read. I should like to hear it read. I do not care anything about the exhibits, but I should like to hear the Secretary's general statement about this matter, unless it would take too much time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It comprises six or eight pages. Does the Senator ask that it be read?

Mr. VEST. Unless it would take too much time. I do not know how long it is.

Mr. LODGE. How many pages does it comprise?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps 10 pages.

Mr. VEST. Let it be read if it is only 10 pages long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair discovers that it is a great deal longer. It comprises the entire document here. There must be 30 pages of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Thirty printed pages?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty printed pages.

Mr. ALLEN. Why can not that be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. VEST. I do not ask that it be read if it is that long.

Mr. ALLEN. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is too much matter to be printed in the RECORD, although I do not know; it may be such an important document that it deserves to be printed in the RECORD. If it were read, of course it would appear in the RECORD.

Mr. VEST. I take it for granted that the Secretary has answered in a general way the inquiry which was made of him by the Senate and that in substantiating his statement he has filed these exhibits. My object in asking for the reading is to get a general idea of what his statement is. It seems to me that the Senate ought, out of respect to him, to have it read.

Mr. ALLISON. Without knowing the contents of the paper. I think the Secretary has attempted to answer with great fullness and in an explicit way the inquiries of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska. I would be glad to hear it read, or I think it might very well be printed in the RECORD or printed as a document, I do not care which. It ought to be printed as a document in connection with the papers submitted.

Mr. ALLEN. It ought to be printed as a part of the proceedings, with all the exhibits, as a document.

Mr. ALLISON. It can be printed in a day or two. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Missouri that this document can be printed and placed on our tables to-morrow or Friday morning. I ask that the communication be printed as a document, with all the accompanying papers, and then we shall have the whole story, whatever it is.

Mr. ALLEN. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest that if we print the report of the Secretary and the accompanying documents we shall have a great, cumbersome book that nobody will read. Not only ought the communication to be printed with the accompanying papers, but as a separate document, because most people will want to see the report without regard to the papers that accompany it. I suggest to the Senators to have it done in that way.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I do not object to that.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not object to that part of it, but I want to see the report, with the exhibits, printed as an entire document.

Mr. VEST. We ought to have that report read.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator from Nebraska desires will be done under my suggestion. The communication will be printed, with the accompanying papers, as a document. All together it will be a very bulky document. Then let the Secretary's report be also printed as a document by itself.

Mr. ALLEN. I think it ought to go in the RECORD, too. The RECORD has a general circulation.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the Secretary's report itself going into the RECORD.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want the exhibits to go into the RECORD, but I want the report itself printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. Then let the RECORD to-morrow morning contain the report of the Secretary. Let the report be printed separately as a document, and let it also be printed, with the papers accompanying it, as another document.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that the report of the Secretary be printed in the RECORD; that the report and memorandum accompanying it (there is a memorandum separate from the other papers) be printed together as a document, and that the other papers be printed with the report and memorandum. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The communication ordered to be printed in the RECORD is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1900.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE OF THE SENATE.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution dated January 4, 1900; which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all letters, communications, agreements, papers, and documents between the Treasury Department of the Government of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or either or both of them, since the 4th day of March, A. D. 1897, in any manner respecting the deposit of public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States with said bank or banks, and inform the Senate respecting any other relation or relations now or heretofore existing between the Government of the United States and the said bank or banks, and the amount of money, bonds, public funds, and revenues, respectively, deposited in said bank or banks by the Government of the United States, the reasons therefor, and whether said bank or banks have paid the Government of the United States any interest on said deposit or deposits, and if so, how much interest and the length of time the money, public funds, bonds, and the revenues of the Government of the United States were held on deposit by said bank or banks, and whether said money, public funds, bonds, and revenues, or any portion thereof, were loaned to other banks, corporations, or persons, giving their names and addresses, respectively, and if so, the amount and dates thereof, respectively. And the Secretary of the Treasury is further directed to inform the Senate what compensation has been paid to said bank or banks, directly or indirectly, by the Government of the United States for the custody, handling, and disbursement of said money, public funds, bonds, and revenues of the Government of the United States, and give to the Senate all other information in any manner pertaining to said transaction or transactions."

Such transactions as the Treasury Department has had with the banks specifically named in the resolution, or with any other banks not so specifically named, have been governed by the provisions of section 5153 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

"All national banking associations designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be depositaries of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary; and they may also be employed as financial agents of the Government; and they shall perform all such reasonable duties, as depositaries of public moneys and financial agents of the Government, as may be required of them. The Secretary of the Treasury shall require the associations thus designated to give satisfactory security, by the deposit of United States bonds and otherwise, for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them, and for the faithful performance of their duties as financial agents of the Government. And every association so designated as receiver or depositary of the public money shall take and receive at par all of the national currency bills, by whatever association issued, which have been paid into the Government for internal revenue, or for loans or stocks."

The statute quoted became a law June 3, 1864, and from that day to the present time it has been the practice of the Treasury Department to deposit with such institutions, as convenience might suggest or require, internal revenue and other receipts, except those from customs.

The first marked recognition of such agencies occurred during the period when the refunding operations were being carried on in the seventies, but particularly in 1876, incident to the resumption of specie payments, when Secretary Sherman found it necessary to place with national-bank depositaries large sums of money, reaching as high as $270,544,645 at the end of May of that year.

The second notable use of national banks as Government depositaries was in 1897 and 1898. Then, owing to an abnormal surplus of revenues, Secretary Fairchild increased the number of depositary banks, and encouraged those then existing to enlarge their qualification to hold public moneys by increasing the amount of their United States bonds on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States as security. Under this operation public moneys were accumulated in the depositary banks until, at the end of February, 1898, the aggregate was $61,546,000. Later, when the revenues decreased, funds were transferred from the depositary banks to the subtreasuries, whence they were disbursed on account of public expenditure. By midsummer of 1892 the balances in depositary banks were reduced to their normal average of about $15,000,000, and they were maintained practically at this figure until the early months of 1896, when a portion of the moneys derived from the sale of bonds of that year was deposited with such banks. At the end of March, 1896, public deposits in national banks aggregated $27,010,994.

On March 4, 1897, there were 159 national-bank depositaries, holding a total of $16,108,410. With few exceptions, these institutions were made the recipients of deposits from internal-revenue collectors at the various points in the country where the chief offices of the collectors of the several districts are located. All these depositary banks were permitted to hold, as fixed balances, an amount approximating the par value of the bonds deposited as security. Any surplus over the amount which each was authorized to hold was required to be transferred to some one of the several subtreasuries as soon as received.

This general course of affairs and practice continued until November, 1897. At the end of October of that year public deposits in national banks aggregated $17,159,616. During November, however, were begun those large payments which resulted from the highly successful settlement of the Pacific Railroad indebtedness. The receipts on account of the Union Pacific Railroad aggregated $58,448,223.75, all of which was paid between November 23, 1897, and January 6, 1898, a period of little over a month.

It was thought expedient, as a part of this enormous transaction, to utilize for a few days the services of depositary banks, with the result that at the end of November, 1897, public deposits with such institutions had increased to $27,744,217, and at the end of December, 1897, to $40,182,717.

The reason for this action was to avoid the injurious effect upon trade and industry of a too sudden withdrawal from public uses into the vaults of the Treasury of so large a sum as $58,000,000. For the same reason, on December 13, 1897, I gave notice that on Friday, December 24, 1897, the Department would be prepared to begin the redemption, without rebate of interest, of the bonds, aggregating $23,944,932, issued in aid of the Pacific railroads, commonly known as "currency sixes," and maturing January 1, 1898.

By the end of May, 1898, public deposits in depositary banks had been reduced to $28,230,359.

At this time occurred an event which has ever since had a marked influence upon the course of national finances, namely, the breaking out of war between the United States and Spain. June 1, 1898, there were 172 depositary banks, holding a total but little in excess of $28,000,000, thus showing only a slight modification of the condition existing on March 4, 1897, notwithstanding the receipts on account of the Union Pacific settlement.

Now, however, the Government was confronted with the necessity of raising immediately a large fund for war purposes. The act of June 13, 1898, known as the war-revenue act, conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue bonds to the extent of $400,000,000. Acting under this authority, it was considered to be wise and expedient that the people of the United States should be called upon to subscribe to an issue of $200,000,000.

The Treasury Department feels justified in indulging in some degree of pride over the results of this loan. It demonstrated at once the power, wealth, and patriotism of the people of the United States. Those of small means were given the first opportunity to obtain the bonds, and they who had but $20 to invest were the most welcome of all; yet, in passing, it may not be amiss to say that one of the elements of the success of the war loan was the fact that it was supported by great financial institutions. On the day the books were opened the National City Bank of New York and its associates, the Central Trust Company of New York and Vermilye & Co., offered to take at par and accrued interest any portion of the bonds offered that might not be subscribed for by the public.

On the same day, also, as appears from the record of the Department, J. P. Morgan & Co. and their associates, numbering fifteen of the greatest financial houses of the country, subscribed for the entire issue of $200,000,000, or such part thereof as might not be subscribed for by the general public. Without knowing that they would get a dollar of the bonds, unless, through some untoward event, the national credit should become impaired and the new bonds fall in value, they thus substantially guaranteed the success of the loan.

It will readily be recognized by everyone that the absorption by the Government of a sum so large as $200,000,000 within the space of a few weeks could not fail to disturb most seriously the general business of the country. In fact, it is not saying too much to allege that were the Government to draw into the Treasury $200,000,000 within a brief period of time, the financial disaster and ruin which would ensue would be appalling. The obligation to avoid such unhappy conditions is one of which the Secretary of the Treasury is deeply sensible, and he feels with some measure of just pride that the financing of the war loan of 1898 was accomplished without the slightest interruption to that revival of commerce and the industries of the country which has made the present a period of unexampled prosperity.

In the conduct of the war loan the Treasury again resorted to depositary banks, and their use as such may be seen from the following statement:

1898.	Balance at end of month.
May.....	$28,230,359.72
June.....	38,735,630.52
July.....	58,201,017.70
August.....	65,968,467.15
September.....	80,888,712.00
October.....	95,014,969.60
November.....	94,641,001.00
December.....	94,860,916.00

These deposits were scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land in forty-three States and Territories. December 31, 1898, the number of national-bank depositaries was 316. In the course of affairs just reviewed the depositary banks in the city of New York were able to buy more bonds and thus qualify themselves in a much larger proportion than the interior cities and smaller towns throughout the country.

Yet many applications to be designated as depositaries came from such quarters after the money for the war bonds had been substantially paid in and there appeared to be no further need for diverting the funds from the subtreasuries. With a view, therefore, to secure a more equitable distribution of the depositary funds, beginning early in January, 1899, I designated between forty and fifty depositaries throughout the country and directed the internal-revenue receipts, or a portion thereof, to be deposited in such new depositaries. At the same time transfers from the New York City banks into the subtreasuries were ordered, thus reducing the proportion of the total funds held by the New York City banks. On January 1, 1899, the New York City banks held a total deposit of $43,275,487. By the 30th of June the following changes had occurred: New York City banks had been reduced to $24,680,391, and the other cities, towns, and villages had been increased from $50,570,879 on January 1, 1899, to $54,624,481 on June 30, 1899. These operations, covering a period of six months, had therefore resulted in decreasing deposits from a total of about $94,000,000 January 1, 1899, to a total of about $79,000,000 on June 30 of that year.

Thus closed the fiscal year 1899, and this point of time marks another important change in the course of the public finances. The National Treasury had at last begun to feel the influence of the revival of commerce and the industries under the revenue legislation of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and with the closing month of the last fiscal year the Government's receipts showed a marked tendency toward improvement. The wider activities we have been enjoying have been reflected month by month since the opening of the current fiscal year by increasing receipts, both from customs and internal revenue. Six months of the current fiscal year have now elapsed, and for the half year ending December 31, 1899, there was an excess of receipts over expenditures aggregating $21,028,935. This absorption of money from an active use in trade and commerce into the Treasury, where it could serve no present useful purpose, was the source of apprehension to the public and of anxiety to the Department. The situation was intensified by the fact that the fall movement of currency to the interior for the movement of crops operated to reduce the cash reserves at all the commercial centers and to disturb the ability of the banks to continue their operations as lenders of credit.

For more than half a century it has been the established policy of the Government to endeavor, wherever it may, to contribute toward the avoidance of commercial disaster. If Secretary Windom may be quoted as an authority, attention is called to the following extract from his annual report for 1890:

"The policy of affording 'relief to the money market,' now so much criticized in certain quarters, is by no means a new thing. It has been the uniform policy of the Government, when possible, in all commercial crises from 1846 to the present time."

Indisposed to increase deposits in public depositories, if it could be avoided, on October 10, 1899, I offered to anticipate, until December 31, 1899, interest coming due at any time during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. This offer was accompanied by the requirement that the beneficiaries of such payment should allow to the Government a rebate on the interest so received, at the rate of 2.4 per cent per annum. Had all the holders of the public debt applied for interest payment under this offer, $26,000,000 might have been thus used. As a matter of fact, however, the applications were so few that only $2,219,847.60 was disbursed.

Perceiving the futility of this method of reducing the Treasury's absorption of funds which were needed in active business, I offered to buy, for the sinking fund, any part or all of $25,000,000 of those issues of Government bonds first maturing—i. e., the fives of 1904, and the fours of 1907, the total outstanding issues of which amounted to $659,690,400. The price at which the Government would buy these bonds was fixed at the current market price of the day preceding the announcement. This proposition, of which Congress was duly advised in my last annual report, was kept open until December 23, 1899, but only $19,300,650 of the bonds were presented for sale in response to the Department's offer.

In the purchase of this amount the Government disbursed $21,771,806. While holders of such bonds were given until December 23 last to present them for redemption, offerings to the Treasury ceased substantially about December 5, the price of the bonds having advanced in the market to a point 14 per cent higher than the price offered by the Government.

Perceiving that the full amount of bonds thus desired would not be received, on December 14, 1899, I announced that coupons for interest due January 1, 1900, would be cashed on presentation at any of the subtreasuries, and checks were remitted on December 15 to all the holders of registered bonds entitled to interest on January 1. As with the other efforts of the Department above outlined, I hoped this measure, comparatively unimportant in itself, would tend to avert anything like a panic and the resultant widespread evils. The measure was one more of assurance that the Government stood ready to guard the welfare of general business than of inherent efficacy.

The movement toward stringency in the money market had assumed too great momentum to be averted by the means already employed. December 18, 1899, an unsettling financial panic occurred in New York. Prices of investment securities of every grade and kind except Government bonds fell ruinously, interest rose to fabulous rates, and a general constriction of the money market was apparent. While this state of affairs found its most violent expression in the security market, it excited a state of anxiety and alarm throughout our industrial and commercial communities wherever located.

The situation was believed to be so grave as to justify the utmost interference. As before stated, the daily receipts into the Treasury were in excess of expenditures, and it was clearly perceived that such excess for December would be seven or eight millions. Under these circumstances a peculiar responsibility was thrown upon the Treasury Department. The authority conferred by section 5153, Revised Statutes, to place public money, except customs, in designated depositories gave power to relieve the situation without possible prejudice to the Treasury's needs. On the evening of December 18, 1899, there appeared, therefore, in the public press the following announcement:

"The Secretary of the Treasury announced at the close of business to-day that he would increase the funds in depository banks now existing and would designate new depository banks, which may apply and qualify themselves by deposit of United States bonds, as the law requires. To such banks the incoming receipts from internal revenue, estimated at about $1,000,000 a day, will be distributed. The large balance in the Treasury will enable the Government to deposit to a total of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, should so much be applied for."

Thus much I have premised before proceeding to respond to the resolution specifically, in order that a general review of my whole course of this branch of the public finances may be before you. I may add that as a principle of action I have endeavored so to manage receipts and expenditures as to produce the least disturbance in that part of the money supply which must be at the service of commercial and industrial use.

Success or failure in this direction may be here indicated. Since June 1, 1898, the receipts of the Treasury, including proceeds of bonds, have amounted to about eleven hundred millions of dollars. With the aid and use of depositories, the actual cash in the Treasury vaults at the dates shown herewith was as follows:

July	$22,601,730.13
October	304,550,065.89
1899:
January	282,066,064.49
April	275,986,434.22
July	273,859,780.70
October	263,497,897.49
1900:

It will be observed that substantial equilibrium has been maintained at all times, and the result has been to minimize the evils which may attend the administration of Government finances under our present system.

The resolution directs particular attention to the relation of the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank to the Treasury with regard to public deposits. The National City Bank was appointed a depository July 21, 1894. It qualified as such by the deposit of $200,000 of United States bonds, and the collector of the internal revenue district in which said bank is situated was directed to deposit from the above date a portion of his collections. The bank, according to the rule for all such agencies, was permitted to retain as a balance an amount equal—never more than par—to the bonds deposited by it with the Treasurer of the United States.

This continued to be the course of business with said bank until February, 1895, at which time the then Secretary of the Treasury effected the sale of a large amount of Government bonds in exchange for gold. In that connection it was deemed advisable by him to use, for temporary purposes, five national banks in New York as depositories. The records show that in connection with that operation something over $15,000,000 was deposited with the First National Bank of New York, $2,600,000 with the National City, $3,100,000 with the National Park, $1,300,000 with the National Bank of Commerce, and upward of $1,000,000 with the Hanover National Bank. The amounts so deposited with said banks were secured as usual by the pledge of United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States; and the moneys were from time to time transferred to the subtreasury, under the orders of the Secretary, until June 20, 1895, when they were all so transferred.

It appears also that in February, 1896, an issue of bonds was made in connection with which the New York banks were again used as depositories in the following manner: The First National Bank of New York was made a depository to the amount of $5,500,000; the National City, $9,600,000; the National Bank of Commerce, $1,800,000; the Chase National Bank, $1,900,000; the Continental National, $3,100,000, and the Hanover National Bank, $9,000,000. These deposits were secured as usual by the pledge of United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States; and the moneys were, from time to time, transferred to the subtreasury under the orders of the Secretary until June, 1896, when they were fully transferred, with this exception: The Hanover National Bank being a temporary depository, the account was entirely closed, while the National City Bank, being what is known as a permanent depository, had the amount which it was permitted to hold reduced to its qualification as a permanent depository, namely, $200,000.

The status of the National City Bank, so far as the Treasury Department was concerned, remained substantially without change until the settlement of the Pacific Railroad indebtedness, late in 1897. I have heretofore adverted to this subject, but its importance justifies repetition. The Union Pacific settlement brought to the Treasury the sum of $58,448,223.75. This sum was paid in substantially equal installments ten days apart. To avoid the transfer of so large a sum in so short a period from public uses in the Treasury vaults, the New York banks were invited to qualify as temporary depositories for the reception of funds received on this account. Eight banks qualified, as follows: The National City, the Chase National, the Hanover National, the Fifth National, the American Exchange National, the National Bank of the Republic, the Seaboard National, and the Western National. The National City qualified for the reception of an amount approximating $24,000,000. It received of the Union Pacific money as the highest amount at any one time, $23,883,652.27, and as fast as the other banks above enumerated qualified it transferred to those institutions as follows: To the Chase National, $2,000,000; to the Hanover National, $2,000,000; to the Fifth National, $200,000; to the American Exchange National, $500,000; to the National Bank of the Republic, $500,000; to the Seaboard National, $500,000, and to the Western National, $1,000,000. These various sums were withdrawn by transfer to the subtreasury until all of the several balances were finally disbursed.

As has been stated in another part of this communication, a new and deranging influence, both to the Treasury and general commercial affairs, appeared in June, 1898, through the offer of the Government to place by popular subscription the sum of $200,000,000 in 3 per cent bonds. As before explained, the receipt into the Treasury of such an enormous sum of money within a period of three or four months could not be regarded by any intelligent person otherwise than as a dangerous thing for the public interests, and as an entirely useless thing to the Government finances. For these reasons the Treasury Department announced to all national banks its desire to place temporarily on deposit a portion of this incoming fund, and all banks, without regard to size or location, were invited to apply and qualify as temporary depositories. Three hundred and eighteen banks so applied either for increase or designation and qualified in various sums by the deposit of bonds, as required by Treasury regulations. All applications were accepted; none was refused. The National City Bank qualified itself by the deposit of more than $14,000,000 of bonds, and the balance held by said bank on this account never exceeded $14,000,000. The Hanover National Bank qualified itself by the deposit of more than $11,000,000 of bonds and received a balance never larger than $11,000,000.

Toward the close of the year 1898 many banks scattered throughout the country, which could not qualify as depositories for lack of bonds during the period when the bond money was coming into the Treasury, applied for designation as temporary depositories. I have already explained how, with a view to securing a better distribution of the public moneys in depository banks, a number of such banks were designated at interior cities and towns early in the year 1899, while at the same time the balances in the New York banks were reduced by transfer to the subtreasury. On January 7, 1899, the National City Bank held as a deposit $20,565,000. The Hanover National Bank, on the same day, held $7,560,000. By July 8, 1899, the National City's deposit had been reduced to $10,500,000, and the deposit with the Hanover had been reduced to $4,075,000.

The next transaction which the Treasury Department had with the National City Bank as a Government depository relates to the deposit with that institution of the proceeds of the sale of the old custom-house property in the city of New York. This entire transaction is fully described in a memorandum herewith, prepared in the office of the Supervising Architect. Copies of all papers and documents relating to the same are also herewith transmitted. I adopt as my own the memorandum referred to, because it is a complete and full answer to the inquiry presented in the resolution. I desire to call attention to one feature of the case which offers an opportunity for misunderstanding. It is alleged that the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law by depositing the proceeds of the sale of this property in a bank depository, because the act authorizing the sale decreed that the proceeds should be deposited "in the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, derived from the sale of Government property." Every United States depository bank is, within the meaning of section 5153, Revised Statutes a part of the United States Treasury. The moneys which may be deposited in such a bank include all classes of receipts except customs, and when such moneys are deposited in such a bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States they are "in the Treasury" just as much as if they were physically on deposit in the Treasury vaults at Washington.

The Comptroller of the Treasury, whose decision is binding upon the executive branch of the Government, holds "that money is paid into the Treasury of the United States by being deposited with the Treasurer of the United States here in Washington, or to his credit with an assistant treasurer or in a designated depository. This has been the uninterrupted and universal rule governing the accounting officers of the Government for many years." See the letter of Hon. R. J. Tracowell, Comptroller of the Treasury, dated January 8, 1900, herewith.

The practice of the Treasury Department with reference to depositing money in the Treasury is shown by letters addressed to me by Mr. J. F. Meline, Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Washington, D. C.; Mr. E. B. Daskam, who has been connected with the Department thirty-five years, and for many years has been Chief of the Division of Public Monies, and Mr. W. F. MacLennan, who, connected with the Department for thirty years, has for twenty years of that period been Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants. I content myself by here quoting one—that of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States, Mr. J. F. Meline, who for thirty-four years last past has been intimately associated with the business of the Treasurer's office. His letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE TREASURER,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1899.

SIR: In response to your verbal inquiry as to what constitutes a deposit in the Treasury of the United States, I have to say that in my opinion a lawfully constituted depository bank is as much the Treasury of the United States as any of the offices of the Treasury system. The practice in vogue in the Department has been to consider the fact of the Secretary of the Treasury covering in such receipts as are authorized to be deposited with national bank depositories with the law, in properly getting the money into the Treasury of the United States. The balance of public funds reported at stated periods as available to the Treasurer's check covers not only the funds held in the Treasury offices and mints, but also the amounts held by the national bank depositories to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. This total represents the moneys in the "United States Treasury."

Respectfully,

J. F. MELINE,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

In the case of Branch vs. United States (100 Sup. Ct. Rep., 673), Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court. That was a case where, by order of a district court, its clerk deposited to his credit in a national bank, duly designated as a depository of public money, funds which were in dispute between the United States and certain claimants. The bank failed, and judgment concerning the disposition of the funds having been rendered in favor of the claimant, he brought a suit against the United States to recover said proceeds on the ground that as the bank was at the time when the deposit was made a designated depository of public money, it was part of the Treasury of the United States, and that consequently the deposit made by the clerk was equivalent to the payment of the money into the Treasury, binding the United States to the claimant for its return in case the court should determine in the condemnation suit that the cotton when seized was not liable to confiscation. This is what Chief Justice Waite said:

"The position assumed by the appellants is to our mind wholly untenable. The designated depositories are intended as places for the deposit of public moneys of the United States; that is to say, money belonging to the United States. No officer of the United States can charge the Government with liability for moneys in his hands not public moneys by depositing them in his own credit in a bank designated as depository."

It can not be contended by reasonable persons that the language used was a decision that a designated depository is not a part of the Treasury of the United States. It simply means that a public officer can not deposit moneys which are not public moneys in a designated depository so as to bind the Treasury of the United States for their return. The Chief Justice declared what the designated depositories are when he said:

"The designated depositories are intended as places for the deposit of the public moneys of the United States; that is to say, money belonging to the United States."

The proceeds of the sale of the old custom-house property in New York City were moneys belonging to the United States, and they were deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and were, therefore, "in the Treasury."

The case of Couderc, Administrator, vs. United States, opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McKenna, was a case where money was deposited by the marshal, to await the further order of the court, in a national bank which was a designated depository of public moneys. A portion of this deposit was lost by reason of the failure of the bank. The Supreme Court held in its opinion, reported in 175 Reports, 178, that such money deposited by the marshal to await a further order of the court was not public money. After quoting those sections of the law which were involved in the case, Justice McKenna said:

"It is obvious from these provisions that it was only public money of the United States of which national banks could be made depositories, and it was therefore only public money which an officer could deposit in them, whether he received it originally or received it to disburse. This is the ruling in the Branch case, and it is clearly applicable to the case at bar."

These two cases which have been referred to as conclusively determining the unlawfulness of the deposit of the proceeds of the sale of the old custom-house property in New York in the National City Bank, a designated depository, are in fact fully confirmatory of the legality of my action in the premises.

In this connection, reference is also made to the letter of the Solicitor of the Treasury, which appears among those accompanying this communication.

A reference to the memorandum prepared in the office of the Supervising Architect, referred to above, will show that the old custom-house property was sold July 3, 1890, to the National City Bank of New York for $3,265,000, which amount was $190,000 larger than that tendered by the next highest bidder. August 28, 1898, certificates of deposit were forwarded to the Department covering $3,210,000, which was credited as proceeds of old custom-house property in New York in the general account of the Treasurer of the United States with the National City Bank, a designated depository. Of this deposit the Treasurer of the United States was informed, and the fund was duly accepted by him as a "deposit in the Treasury," subject to his jurisdiction and orders. Subsequently the National City Bank was ordered by the Treasurer of the United States to transfer to the subtreasury and to other national bank depositories a sum approximating $3,800,000. In the meantime new internal-revenue receipts have been deposited with such bank to an amount substantially equivalent.

No rent has been paid to the National City Bank for the Government's occupancy of the old custom-house premises, for the reason that such payment awaits appropriation by Congress.

In a previous part of this communication I have reviewed in general the situation leading up to the panic of December 18 last, and have quoted in full the announcement which was made on the evening of that day to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury would place in designated depositories the incoming internal-revenue receipts to total of $50,000,000 or $40,000,000 should so much be applied for. The record will show that early on the morning of the 19th of December, 1899, the National City Bank had, in pursuance of my announcement, deposited with the Assistant Treasurer at New York $4,000,000 in United States bonds, which it desired to pledge as security for deposits. During the day applications of a similar kind from various parts of the country were received, and so continued until the evening of December 22, when it was found that sixty-eight banks had applied either for original designation or for an increase in their former deposit allowance. The total sum thus applied for aggregated $17,846,000.

On Tuesday, the 19th of December, I held a conference with the Treasurer of the United States as to a safe and convenient way to distribute the incoming revenue among the numerous applicants, with the view of giving to each his fair and just proportion, without favoritism toward any. As a result of this conference the Treasurer was directed to address a letter to the National City Bank of New York, a copy of which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE TREASURER UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1899.

SIR: The Secretary of the Treasury directs that the proceeds of the internal revenue shall, for the present, be concentrated in your bank. Instructions to that end have been sent to the various depository banks throughout the country. The purpose of this concentration is for distribution of funds to all the banks which accept the offer of the Department to pledge additional bonds in order to secure such moneys.

You will appreciate that at present the Department can leave with your bank only a fair pro rata share of the funds transferred to you, and will ask you to pay transfers drawn on your bank for the proposed distribution. Care will be taken by this office to insure the retention by you of your fair and increasing share of the funds gathered by this process, and the transfers will be adjusted with this plan in view.

The Department relies on your cooperation in this task, and trusts that the receipts will without unreasonable delay fill your quota of deposits.

Respectfully,

ELLIS H. ROBERTS,
Treasurer of the United States.

MR. JAMES STILLMAN,
President National City Bank, New York City.

In considering these instructions it must be borne in mind that the incoming receipts were about $1,000,000 per day; that the National City Bank had $4,000,000 of bonds on deposit against which it had no Government funds in its hands; that the next largest depository of bonds was the Hanover National Bank, in amount $1,910,000, and the next largest to that bank, the First National Bank of New York, which had on deposit $1,500,000. This latter deposit, it may be added, was not made until December 22. Evidently considerations of relative security pointed to the National City Bank as the best qualified intermediary for distribution. It was this consideration, and this alone, that operated on my mind in the choice of that bank to perform the service contemplated. At my request the Hon. Ellis H. Roberts, Treasurer of the United States, has reviewed the transactions of his office under my order of December 18, 1899.

A copy of his statement will be found herewith, from which it appears that urgent reasons made it desirable to concentrate the distributable funds at a single point, from which transfers could be made.

No Treasury office is adapted to such a purpose. It was necessary, therefore, to select a bank strong enough and with a volume of securities pledged for such deposits adequate to cover the transactions from day to day. The National City Bank of New York was the only bank which met this requirement, and it was therefore accordingly directed to assume the task. If any other bank had earlier pledged a similar or greater amount of United States bonds as security for deposits, it would, under the circumstances, have been directed to assume the distribution of the incoming receipts.

To prevent delay in the distribution of the funds and to return to the banks promptly consideration for their pledged securities, a group of depositories was constituted, including all applicants to December 23. All applications were accepted to the full amount of the bonds proffered. They were 68 in number, and came from 21 States. A list of such banks and the amount of the securities put up by each is given in the letter of the Treasurer now under consideration.

The acceptance of the work of distribution is shown by the following letter, signed by the president of that bank:

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, December 21, 1899.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have received this morning from the Treasurer of the United States a letter advising me that the various depositories of the internal-revenue receipts throughout the country have been instructed to remit here, and that we will be called upon to distribute these receipts pro rata among the various banks who qualify as depositories.

It will give us a great deal of pleasure to act in this capacity; but I feel, inasmuch as we deposited immediately with the assistant treasurer here upward of $4,000,000 in bonds, all of which were secured by us at a considerable expense, and that we the same day placed in the market a large amount of money in anticipation of receiving at once reimbursements from the United States Government, that the pro rata distribution which the Treasurer refers to would work a material hardship upon us. I therefore hope that before we are required to divert the receipts to any extent we may be allowed to accumulate a sufficient amount to cover the bonds which we have deposited.

Very respectfully, yours,

JAS. STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE, Washington, D. C.

The request made by the National City Bank that it be allowed to accumulate a sufficient amount to cover the bonds it had deposited before it was required to divert the receipts to any extent was not complied with, as will fully appear below.

The concentration of funds in the National City Bank of New York was begun at once. Transfers to the designated banks were drawn daily on that institution to an amount a little less than internal-revenue collections each day concentrated with it. All banks having pledged $50,000 of bonds, $100,000 of bonds, in fact, all applicants in the group designated, have been satisfied by deposits in full by transfers on the National City Bank, except five depositories, the amount of whose securities pledged for this account exceeds $800,000 in each case. Special attention is directed to the fact that the Treasurer reports that at the same time, January 6, 1899, the amounts of funds on deposit in the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, New York, under the order of December 18, are shown by the books of his office to be as follows: The National City Bank holds $2,300,000 against $4,000,000 bonds, and the Hanover National Bank $1,160,000 against $1,910,500 bonds.

Accompanying this communication are copies of all letters, communications, agreements, papers, and documents as called for by the resolution. There is also transmitted a statement showing the amount of public money or revenue deposited with all national bank depositories at this time. No bonds have ever been deposited with national bank depositories.

The resolution contains an inquiry as to the length of time public moneys, etc., have been kept on hand in said banks. No public funds are ever deposited with national bank depositories for any specified time. Such funds are held by the depositories subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, and are payable by such depositories at all times upon demand.

No bank is permitted to hold an amount of balance in excess of the par value of the United States bonds furnished as security therefor. It is the uniform rule of the Department to allow a balance equal to par of the security furnished if consisting of United States 4 or 5 per cent bonds and 95 per cent on 3 per cent bonds.

The table which accompanies this letter will show in general the length of time during which existing depository banks have held public deposits.

No interest is received by the Government on public deposits, and no compensation has ever been paid by the Government to national-bank depositories for services rendered by them.

Summing up my reply to the several inquiries of the resolution, I would say:

First. That the reason for utilizing national banks as depositories for public moneys, as authorized by law, when the receipts of the Treasury were exceeding its expenditures, has been to avoid the disturbance to business which the withdrawal of large sums of money from active circulation to the Treasury vaults must inevitably cause. The policy thus pursued by me has been the established policy of the Government for many years, and a departure from it under similar conditions would certainly cause disastrous results.

Second. The reason for directing the internal-revenue receipts into depository banks at this time is that the revenues are now largely exceeding disbursements from month to month, and seem likely to do so for an indefinite time. This condition would be a menace to the business world if assurances were not given that this surplus would be diverted from the Treasury vaults to public depositories, where, while secure to the Government, it would remain available to business use.

Third. The reason for directing all of the internal-revenue receipts to one depository was that it is more convenient to first collect the receipts of numerous offices into one place, and make the desired distribution from it, than to give new instructions daily to 113 collectors. The most convenient agency to effect such distribution is a bank which is a member of the New York Clearing House.

Fourth. The reason for selecting the National City Bank as such distributing agent was that at the time the order was issued it was one of but two banks which had offered bonds sufficient to cover the amount of the daily deposit. Its bond deposit was $4,000,000 and that of the Hanover National Bank $1,910,500. The National City Bank was therefore the one most naturally chosen. Of the 68 banks applying for a share of the deposits, the National City Bank, the Hanover National Bank, and 3 others, applicants for over $800,000 each, are the only ones out of the 68 constituting group 1 which have not been supplied the full amount for which they had offered security.

Fifth. The custom-house property was sold to the National City Bank as the highest bidder on July 3, 1899. Under the terms of the sale it had the option of paying in cash all of the purchase money at any time, or any part it might elect above $750,000, which sum it was absolutely obliged to pay. It exercised this option by choosing to pay $3,215,000, leaving $50,000 yet due. No deed will be executed until full payment has been made.

The payment received was turned into the Treasury by deposit in the National City Bank, it having been the established custom of Treasury officials, under the counsel of their legal advisers, supported by decisions of the Supreme Court, to consider moneys on deposit to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in designated depositories as moneys in the Treasury. This deposit was made in a depository bank for the same reason that other deposits have been made in them, viz, because to withdraw the currency into the vaults of the Treasury, where it was not needed and could not be utilized, would have required a withdrawal of credit that was being extended in commercial circles, and to that extent a disturbance to the natural order of business would have followed. To have required its payment by the National City Bank to another designated depository would have been an ungracious discrimination without substantially changing the fact.

Finally, under my administration of the Treasury Department no discrimination in favor of one bank against another has been made. Generally speaking, when an increase in depository banks was desired, all have been invited to qualify themselves for receiving such money, and have been equally and equitably considered in their respective relations to the Treasury.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE. I have here a petition urging favorable consideration of the treaty of The Hague. It is a very brief petition with a not very large number of signers, but the names are unusual—all men of great distinction. The petition covers only one short printed page. I should be very glad if the petition and the signatures could be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The printing of the signatures can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BATE. What is the petition?

Mr. LODGE. It is a petition for the favorable consideration of The Hague treaty. It is too short and small to make a document of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the petition he presents may be printed, with the signatures, in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the members of the Senate:

The undersigned unite in respectfully urging your favorable consideration of the treaty of The Hague, relative to the peaceful adjustment of international differences.

The Congress of the United States, in 1890, adopted a concurrent resolution requesting the President to invite from time to time negotiations with all foreign powers, to the end that any differences or disputes which could not be adjusted by diplomatic agency might be referred to arbitration and be peaceably adjusted by such means. In the spirit of this resolution our Government was among the first to accept the proposal of the Emperor of Russia for a conference "as to the most effective means of securing to all peoples the benefits of a real and durable peace."

The labors of that conference, in which the leading powers of the world were represented, resulted in a unanimous agreement. This agreement establishes as the avowed policy of all the nations concerned the beneficent principle that force ought not to be employed unless neither friendly offices, nor mediation, nor arbitration, can settle the difficulty. At the same time it leaves every nation absolutely free to follow its own judgment of what its interest and honor demand.

Our representatives in the conference declared over their signatures, and their action in so doing was accepted as entirely satisfactory, that the treaty was not to be held to conflict with our traditional foreign policy. European interference in American affairs is not invited or permitted.

For more than a hundred years the United States has been foremost among the nations in the settlement of international disputes by means of arbitration.

Therefore we trust that the pending treaty, the provisions of which we have carefully examined, may receive your favorable consideration.

We have the honor to transmit, under separate cover, two pamphlets in which the merits of the treaty are discussed.

With great respect, we remain,

Siméon E. Baldwin, president of the International Law Association; Cornelius N. Bliss, ex-Secretary of the Interior; John L. Cadwalader, ex-Assistant Secretary of State; John G. Carlisle, ex-Secretary of the Treasury; James C. Carter, president of the Bar Association of New York; Leander T. Chamberlain, New York; Grover Cleveland, ex-President of the United States; Thomas J. Wilson, ex-Postmaster-General; Benjamin Ide Wheeler, president of the University of California; William C. Whitney, ex-Secretary of the Navy; James B. CHARLESTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, CHARLESTON, S. C.

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted by the Charleston Chamber of Commerce at their meeting held on December 12, 1899:

Whereas the Commercial Cable Company of Cuba has petitioned the Congress of the United States to pass the necessary legislation to authorize the construction of a competing cable between the United States of America and Cuba: It is Further resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be respectfully requested to use their best efforts to secure the passage of the necessary legislation to carry these resolutions into effect.

Further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the secretary to each of the Senators and to each member of the House of Representatives from the State of South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee does the Senator from South Carolina desire to have the petition referred?

Mr. McLAURIN. I think perhaps it should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. But there is now a Committee on Relations with Cuba.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What committee does the Senator suggest?

Mr. McLAURIN. The Committee on Relations with Cuba.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be so referred.

LAND SYSTEM OF HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask for the printing of a document prepared by the land agent of Hawaii, J. F. Brown, under the supervision of the officials of the government of Hawaii, which explains fully but still briefly the complicated land system of those islands. I ask that it be printed and lie over, inasmuch as the bill to which it relates is probably to be taken up very soon, and the committee, I think, have had great difficulty in understanding this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE CAUSES THAT PRODUCE TRUSTS—THE REMEDY.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 59) declaring the duty, power, and purpose of Congress to destroy trusts by removing the causes that produce them, to restore competition, and open the door of opportunity to individual and independent business enterprises; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the only logical and effective way to destroy trusts is to remove the causes that logically and inevitably produce them; and Whereas those who control the instruments of commerce have it in their power to control commerce, to build up one section and tear down another, to build up one city or private business enterprise at the expense of another, to destroy all competition and put any and every business into a trust at will; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the power, and makes it its duty, to regulate commerce between the States; and Whereas Congress can exercise and perform this power and duty in no other way except by controlling and regulating the instruments of commerce; and

Whereas each instrument of commerce is a great natural monopoly, and therefore should never be owned by private enterprise, but should belong to all the people and be regulated by their agent, the Government, with justice to all and favoritism to none; and

Whereas the failure of Congress to perform this constitutional duty has resulted in private enterprise taking possession of all the instruments of commerce, and by using them for private gain and power has enabled such private enterprises to absolutely dominate the business world, creating a few great industrial monopolies, known as trusts, which, with the cooperation and favoritism of those who control the instruments of commerce, are enabled to drive every competitor out of business and close the door to individual effort, besides centralizing in a few hands a power over the life and liberty of the people greater than the power of the Government itself: Now, therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the three great instruments of commerce—money, the means of exchange; the national highways, the means of transportation; the post-office, the telegraph, and the telephone, the means of the transmission of intelligence—are, and of right ought to be, public functions.

2. That to this end the national banking system, which delegates to a few private corporations the great governmental function of issuing currency and regulating its volume as selfish whims or private avarice may dictate, should be abolished and the sole power of issuing money and regulating its volume should be restored to the representatives of the people in Congress assembled, where it constitutionally belongs. That every dollar of money issued by the Government, whether of gold, silver, or paper, should be a full legal tender, equal in purchasing and debt-paying power with every other dollar, and that its volume should be from time to time increased to keep pace with the demand of increasing population and business, to the end that prices may remain stable and that debts contracted may be paid in a dollar representing the same amount of labor and product as the dollar of the contract.

3. That the power to build up one city or section and destroy another, the power to build up one business enterprise and close the doors of another, to centralize any line of business into one great industrial trust and to crush out all competitors by discrimination in freights and fares, and by exercising the most powerful, unlimited, and unrestrained taxing power known to the civilized world, which Congress has permitted a few private interests to usurp and control, should, by appropriate legislation, be reclaimed by the people, to the end that the national highways should be open to the use of all on equal terms, to be maintained by taxes or tolls no larger than necessary to maintain the cost.

4. That the telegraph and the telephone, which, with the post-office, constitute one of the three great instruments of commerce, should, as speedily as possible, be reclaimed from private hands and added to the people's great national postal system, where they rightfully belong, to the end that every post-office where citizens live and are taxed to support the Government may have the benefit of all that science and invention have contributed toward equipping a modern, up-to-date postal system.

5. That when Congress by thus exercising its constitutional powers and performing its constitutional duties shall have reclaimed from private hands the trust on money, the trust on transportation, and the trust on the transmission of intelligence, and restored these three great instruments of commerce to the use of all the people as a public blessing, the three greatest trusts for evil known to civilization will have been destroyed and at the same time the causes which have logically and inevitably produced the aggregation of great industrial trusts will be forever removed, the reign of monopoly will be at an end, the door of opportunity be again reopened, and the era of competition, with equal rights to all and special privileges to none, will be reenthroned.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it seems too clear for controversy that the only way to remove any deep-seated evil from the body politic is to remove the cause or causes that produce it. I take it that there will be no controversy as to that proposition. Therefore, the only controversy among those who are opposed to trusts that there can possibly be, will be whether or not the joint resolution which I have offered sets forth the true causes that produce trusts.

Trusts are deep-seated evils on the industrial body politic. Everybody, from the President of the United States down, has denounced these evils, but nothing has been done. We have been tampering with them by restrictive legislation and by palliatives, which is at best simply pruning the branches of the growth and not going to the root.

We have on the statute books much legislation. There is a law, known as the Sherman Act, to remove trusts or to repress them; but yet they flourish under it and in spite of it. That was Republican legislation. When the Wilson-Gorman revenue bill was before Congress another effort was made to deal with the trust problem and another anti-trust measure was put into that act; but I believe that up to date not a single trust has been dissolved by means of that law, and not a single offender has been indicted.

Mr. President, the press of the country to-day is discussing trust evils, and both great political parties are no doubt getting ready in their next national platform to denounce the evil; and yet so far no one, as far as I have seen, has offered a remedy that is more than restrictive or a palliative.

The most sensible editorial that I have seen in any great American paper on this question is in the New Orleans Times-Democrat of Sunday, January 7. I ask permission to read a sentence:

The people have realized ere this that many of those who are shouting the loudest against the trusts are not really opposed to them, but are joining in the hue and cry because they want to curry popular sentiment and in the hope that they will be able to prevent anything being done against the trusts or that their own special favorite trust will, in some way, be rescued from the cataclysm of monopolies that must come sooner or later.

Further on in the editorial the editor says:

The test of opposition to the trusts must rest not on mere denouncement of them in platforms or on the stump, but in a willingness to do something practical to crush them, to legislate against them, and to vigorously enforce this legislation, and to attack not a few of the more notorious trusts, but to crush out the entire army of combines and monopolies, root and branch.

Mr. President, the resolution that I have offered furnishes that test. It specifically points to the causes that produce trusts. Those who oppose it must either show that I am wrong and show other causes as the true ones, or they must confess that while "they have joined in the hue and cry" against trusts "because they want to curry popular sentiment," that they are at heart for the trusts and against independent industrial enterprises.

If anyone will show that the causes that I have set forth are not the real causes that produce trusts and will specifically set forth other causes, then I will join him in removing those causes.

But however that may be, the reforms set forth in the resolution are demanded by existing conditions, and, besides, the Constitution demands that Congress take such action.

Suffice it to say now that there is not a case in all history where trusts were formed except where the Government had surrendered these instruments of commerce to private hands.

Mr. President, at a future time I desire to address the Senate at some length on this resolution. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table subject to call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the joint resolution introduced by him lie on the table subject to call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRIES.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 738) to establish the department of commerce and industries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SEIZURES IN AND NEAR DELAGOA BAY.

Mr. HALE. I offer a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas property of citizens of the United States not contraband of war has been lately seized by the military authorities of Great Britain in and near Delagoa Bay, South Africa, without good reason for the same and contrary to the accepted principles of international law; and

Whereas said property is now unjustly detained by the military authorities of Great Britain, in disregard of the rights of the owners of the same: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of State is hereby requested to send to the Senate all information in possession of the State Department relating to said seizure and detention; and also to inform the Senate what steps have been taken in requesting the restoration of property taken and detained as aforesaid, and whether or not the Department has informed the proper British authorities that, if said detention is persisted in, such act will be considered as without warrant and offensive to the Government and people of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Before it goes over, I should like to hear one phrase in the second whereas, the latter part of the preamble, read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas said property is now unjustly detained by the military authorities of Great Britain, in disregard of the rights of the owners of the same: Therefore,

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think we ought to say that in a resolution of inquiry, and as it goes over until to-morrow, when it comes up I hope the Senator from Maine will modify that statement that the property is unjustly detained.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I understand. That can be modified by inserting words so as to read, "said to be unjustly detained."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Something of that kind will answer.

Mr. HALE. I do not think we should assume that it has been done; but I do think that in a matter of such vital importance the attention of the Senate should be drawn to it, and that the executive department of the Government should realize the public sentiment which exists on this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. I think, as it is a pretty important resolution, it had better go over until to-morrow. I should like to see it in print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

DAUGHTERS OF ARTHUR BARNES, DECEASED.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to May Barnes, Blanche Barnes, and Maud Bynum, daughters of Arthur Barnes, deceased, late a messenger on the rolls of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate paid by law to said messenger, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a paper written by Prof. Frank Parsons, of the Boston Law School and the College of Social Science, entitled "Public Ownership," be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to accompany Senate bill No. 1770, entitled "A bill to provide for the acquisition, purchase, construction, and condemnation by the United States of America of railroads lying in the Territories of the United States, the respective States, and the District of Columbia engaged in interstate commerce in carrying the mails, and to provide for the operation of said roads by the United States, and amending the act of Congress of February 4, 1887, entitled 'An act to regulate interstate commerce,' and for other purposes."

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE VICE-PRESIDENT HOBART.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I call up the resolutions which I gave notice I would call up to-day, on the death of the late Vice-President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions submitted by Mr. SEWELL December 4, 1899, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with the deepest regret information of the death of GARRET AUGUSTUS HOBART, late Vice-President of the United States.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be suspended in order that the distinguished public services of the deceased and the virtues of his private character may be fittingly commemorated.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, there are occasions in the life of men and of nations when we turn from the turmoil of civil duties to behold the work of the reaper, Death; there are times of solemnity and bereavement, when language can not portray the emotions of the soul; there are periods when sadness, like a tidal wave, sweeps over a people with resistless force; there are experiences which beget bitter though unavailing tears and vain regret that, like the breath of winter, is fraught with desolation.

Who can glory in his strength, or stretch forth his hand and stay the Angel of Death? Who can defy the dread summons to join the innumerable host, whose way lies through the portals of the tomb? Who can tell the day or the hour when his earthly estate shall be closed and an account rendered of the deeds done in the body?

The uncertainty of human life looms up ever before us and seems to make all human achievements futile and worthless, but this is only apparently so. Men pass away, but their works endure. The body may be laid in the grave, but the rich legacy of lessons and influences of the life of a good, brave, honorable man remain to us and to our children. The subtle, powerful, though silent, influences of such a life bear perennial harvests which death can not destroy.

Our beloved Vice-President has been taken from us, and the nation mourns his loss. The patriotic citizen, the able statesman, the wise counselor, the honorable man, the devoted father has passed away, and the wail of the people will not return to us the departed. The consolation of religion, the teaching of faith, our inborn conviction of immortality, may assuage our grief and temper our sorrow, but this is a wound which can not be healed.

We have appointed this day, Mr. President, to pay our high official and personal tribute of respect to the memory of our late associate and honored dead and to publish to the world his sterling integrity and worth. Let us calmly review his life, services, and character, in which we may find much that will profit us.

GARRET AUGUSTUS HOBART was born in 1844, at Long Branch, N. J. It has been well said that the blood which flowed in his veins was from good English stock and was mingled with the martyr blood of Dutch and Huguenot ancestors and that the spirit of fidelity and courage was his by inheritance. The happy domestic environment in which he lived, enriched by keen intellectuality and literary culture, had much to do with the formation of his character.

He received the benefits of a common-school education, finally graduating from Rutgers College, New Brunswick, in 1863. He then became a school-teacher for a brief period, when he commenced the study of the law, in which profession he attained considerable eminence. Though his means were meager in the early years of his life journey, his natural endowments were such that wealth and success rewarded his toil.

His first public office was that of city counsel of Paterson in 1871, and in the following year he was made counsel of the board of freeholders of his county. He was elected a member of the house of assembly of New Jersey in 1872, reelected in 1873, and attained by his ability and popularity the office of speaker of that body in 1874. He was elected a State senator in 1876, and reelected in 1879. During his six years' service in the State senate he was twice chosen its president. In 1883 he was the nominee of his party for the United States Senate. In 1884 he became a member of the national Republican committee, and served as such until his decease. He was nominated at the national Republican convention in 1896 for the Vice-Presidency, and triumphantly elected, and was sworn into office at Washington, March 4, 1897. He enjoyed the high distinction of his office but a brief period of years, his death occurring the 21st of November last.

Mr. HOBART was removed from his earthly career at an age when the magnificent status of his manhood was reaching its prime; when the grand elements of his character were ripening to their full development; when his great usefulness to the nation was becoming more and more apparent; at an age when his life, chastened by sorrow, hallowed by resignation, and tempered by experience, had been attuned to that key whose sweetness and force reverberated through the hearts and lives of all with whom he came in contact.

His public duties were marked by zeal and devotion to the interests of the people, and some of the most salutary and effective measures upon the statute books of New Jersey were the result of his efforts. He sought in his legislative career to check illegal expenditures and to reduce local and State taxation; to encourage manufactures and promote those enterprises which now place New Jersey in the front rank of States. Educational and philanthropic institutions received his special assistance, and he was one of the leading supporters of the general railroad law of his State, which is one of the most effective of its character. The general welfare, rather than the conserving of private interests, engaged his time and attention.

His shrewdness, sagacity, and promptness soon won him an enviable reputation that was not confined to the limits of his city, while the value of his counsel was defined by the complicated matters intrusted to his care, difficult and arduous duties were so satisfactorily performed by him as to gain the thanks of the public, and so popular had he become that public honors were thrust upon him.

He was a lifelong Republican, and his political views were the fruit of sound judgment, experience, and conscientious thought.

The performance of his duties as President of the Senate has ever evoked the favorable criticism of the members of this body, and the justice and fairness of his rulings have elicited their warmest commendation. Neither the partiality of friendship nor the interest of individuals has warped his judgment or tintured his decisions. His manner of going and coming amongst us was marked by kindness and consideration. No word of censure, no carping criticism, no ungenerous reflection escaped his lips, but his constant desire to help and assist in every proper way was always manifest.

The character of Mr. HOBART was as the open day—neither darkness nor shadow rested upon it. Like a beautiful landscape, its varied features were plainly seen—there was nothing hidden that should be revealed; there was nothing concealed that should be known. Rockribbed by integrity and probity, his conduct was ever just and honorable. The dignity of his manhood spurned all that was mean and worthless, and his virtues lent a charm of manner and social attractiveness that gave him preeminence.

The page of his life was clearly written and without blot or stain, though tinged by sadness for the loss of a dear child from his fireside. His record is unchallenged. The breath of suspicion or the shafts of obloquy could not reach it; the rancor of aspersion could not touch it.

Maligancy and vindictiveness found there no entrance, but rather his life was rounded out by kindness and love for all men. His loyalty to truth, his fealty to duty, his unswerving devotion to the interests of his constituents have carved for him in the hearts of men an enduring tablet. His acts of mercy and philanthropy, though many, were unproclaimed—like the gentle dew of heaven, they nourished the sterile soil of human poverty and lifted up the downcast and fallen. He recognized the fact that human justice and benevolence have not as yet eliminated charity from the social fabric. The enmity evoked by the heat of partisanship and political strife passed by him as an idle wind. Sensitive to reproach and injury, his sympathy reached out to those who were maligned and forbade the entrance of resentment. The even tenor of his way was illumined by a radiance born of noble aspirations and high endeavor.

Fate links such souls as these to greatness, that man, even in his low estate, may see the stamp of Heaven.

My personal relations with Mr. HOBART covered a long period of years, extending from his early manhood. It seems to me now as a golden chain, each link of which constitutes a pleasant service performed or some valuable assistance rendered. His solicitude for the welfare of his friends caused him many personal sacrifices. His heart, his brain, his purse, were welcome to all that needed them—"his pity gave, ere charity began."

His generous hospitality and good cheer flowed in a continuous stream that found its source in the benevolence of his heart. The happiness of others was dearer to him than his own, and the cardinal principles of his creed were sympathy and kindness. He loved to do good, and sought opportunities to accomplish it. His word was his bond, and those who knew him best asked no other security. His course in life indicated obedience to duty and resignation; duty, nobly performed, toward his neighbor and to himself—resignation to whatever might betide, cheerfully and willingly displayed.

Amid the common current of men and affairs, in the daily routine of personal and civic functions, in the exercise of refined and extended social relations, and in the nearer and dearer ties of home the voice of duty prevailed. In sorrow, in disappointment, in the struggle with disease and battle for his life, though sustained by an unflinching energy, resignation pointed the way. Though we indulge the brilliant flow of rhetoric, impassioned by the glow of memory; though we strike the minor chord of eloquence, touched by the poignancy of grief; though we utter a lofty strain of thought, inspired by personal association, yet to me these two words, duty and resignation, seem the leading exponents of his nature.

Ah, Mr. President, we need no inspiration to show that so noble a soul can not taste of annihilation; we need no divine revelation to prove that such a spirit can not pass to the realms of oblivion and nothingness; we need no testimony from the dead that immortality is the reward of such a life. Could we harbor the thought that the reverse were not true, it would wring the very fiber of our nature and proclaim its falsity. Mr. HOBART has passed to the better and higher life that lies beyond the confines of mortality—a life the span of which, unmeasured by the flight of years, is filled with immortal significance and joy.

The lessons of his life, whose pleasant remembrances rob even death of its sadness, let us treasure, and may they prove a stimulating influence in the conduct of our own.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, this body is a miniature of our country. In it is represented both the equality of the States and the unity of the nation. Large and small States, rich and poor States, populous and thinly settled States, all alike have two Senators, and each Senator has one vote. But when we look toward the Chair we behold another ideal of the Constitution incarnate. The Vice-President of the United States, chosen by all the electors of all the States, is President of the Senate. By him is represented here, as by the Federal President is represented in the nation, the supremacy and authority of the United States. And as each of the States appears here as an equal block in the arch of our federative system, so our President would seem to us the keystone binding together in power and grace the tall columns of indestructible States which in his office are visibly linked in indissoluble union.

From the foundation of our Government the people have called to this great office men of character and attainment. Rarely indeed has any mistake been made in the selection, and from Adams and Jefferson to Stevenson and HOBART we may scan with general satisfaction the illustrious roll. Yet I venture to say that the office was never filled by one who met all of its responsibilities with more equal and uniform sufficiency or discharged its duties with more acceptability to all concerned than did our beloved and lamented friend GARRET A. HOBART, who has now passed forever hence where no storm shall roll or billows beat across his peaceful breast.

Few of us knew him, and few indeed had ever seen him before he appeared on Inauguration Day, the 4th of March, 1897, to take the oath of office. But his genial, manly countenance, beaming with health, intelligence, and good nature, and the unaffected dignity of the refined and accomplished gentleman which characterized his bearing were a pleasing introduction before personal presentations were made, and as soon as he assumed his duties it was evident that the gavel was in a master's hand.

Nothing that happened in this Hall escaped the eye of his alert attention. No "occasion sudden" ever overmastered the resources of his ready information or ruffled his even, well-trained mind. He conducted business with composure, facility, accuracy, and expedition. His inborn courtesy and fairness stopped the approaches and suppressed the temptation to unseemly wrangle, while his clear and sympathetic perception and his prompt action attested the virtues and bore the fruits of the decisive character.

This combination of excellent qualities made our late President the model presiding officer of a deliberative assembly. And the fact speaks more than words could utter that throughout his service of well-nigh three years, with oft-repeated trials of his equanimity, his patience, and his skill, not a single incident occurred that mars the memories in which his good name and fame are enshrined.

But such a body as this, diverse in its antecedents, histories, environments, and opinions, and representing such diverse and oft conflicting interests, needs in its presiding officer more than the expert and tactful parliamentarian. Where the technique of the book and the drill and the school find their terminus, wisdom in the practical and involved affairs of men often finds its largest and most fertile field of tillage. That exalted station filled by union—idealizing union—and designed in its institution to conduce to the sentiment, the justice, and the harmony of union, can not be roundly filled save by one of broad and generous social instinct, imbued with the spirituality of the friend, the patriot, and the statesman. "Great empires and small minds," said Edmund Burke, "go ill together," and in such a place the ill fit would be no less than a national calamity.

I do not believe there was any member of this body who did not regard the late Vice-President as a friend, for he was a friendly man, a social man, a neighbor-like man, given, as we have been told, to the large charities which his success made possible, but given, as we know, to the small, sweet courtesies of life, which are perennial charities, given to hospitality, and to all those gracious ways that attract and cement friendship. That he was a patriot none will question. And that he was a pronounced party man, or, if you please, a partisan, can not detract from his merit as man or statesman in the esteem of honorable and candid men.

In our strenuous American life, boiling over with the vast activities, the keen competitions, and the boundless aspirations that free government stimulates in a land of opportunity, with new problems continually springing up for solution, and startling changes bursting unannounced upon the scene, we must of necessity dwell in perpetual conflicts of opinion.

But these conflicts are swiftly followed by settlements at the polls and the evolution of new conflicts again and again and ever more again in endless succession, each one being but an introductory skirmish to a broader field and a heavier battle.

Of such conditions the partisan is alike the cause, the product and the essential solvent. Instead of denouncing the differences of opinion which make him, we should ever recall that these differences are evoked, stimulated, and resolved by the free government which lives, moves, and has its being in them, and that its prime office is to tolerate, protect, and foster them. In this respect such government is in unison with the eternal order of God's providence, which through difference and opposition brings forth what is truest and best and makes them the resultant force in consonance with the ruling principle of the universal thought.

The clashing swords of warriors, the opposing stones of the millers, the upper and lower teeth of animals, the negative and positive poles of electricity, the centripetal and centrifugal tendencies of gravitation, the opposing arguments and votes of debaters, all these are but diversities of the powers which pervade the physical, moral, and intellectual being, and to rebuke or suppress difference of opinion is a certain species of infidelity to, and revolt against, the decrees of the Creator.

Despotism is sad and hateful, because it freezes the inner impulses and paralyzes the movements of the vast and complex mechanism of providential development; and freedom is joyful and loveable, because it looses to their fitting work all the divine forces implanted in the heart of man and in the heart of nature.

Yet differences must unite, oppositions must eventuate, debate must cease, results must be obtained; and freedom, when it has been exercised, but fulfills and verifies itself in bowing to and obeying the overweening thought of the majority.

This thought is freedom's crown. It inheres in the great office which our departed friend was chosen to fill, and which he exalted by the manner in which he filled it.

The very gravest questions of world-wide interest passed to their solution beneath his gavel. War and peace were alike proclaimed within the brief period of his career as Vice-President. But, more than this, every vestige of legislation was wiped away from our statute books that marked the bygone asperity of internecine conflict.

In all the momentous scenes of which he was an important part his influence for good was felt and was profoundly and heartily appreciated. Nothing harsh, fierce, or sardonic, nothing narrow, bigoted, or intolerant, was in his composition or shadows his history. It is a blessing to all the land that such a man has filled such a place. And having filled it well, and filled well the measure of his days, he sleeps well now in the noble Commonwealth of his nativity, which gave him to the Union, and to which the Union, made more perfect and fraternal by his life, hath now returned his honored dust.

It was my sad privilege, with my colleagues, to follow his bier. No gilded pomp or ostentatious show blighted the simplicity of the last scene; but the multitudes gathered from far and wide in mighty concourse, the great officers of the nation and of the State alike mingled with them in their unaffected sorrow, and with the beautiful service of the church to which he belonged he was laid to his earthly rest.

Who could have witnessed that impressive scene, where wealth and power and art and skill and all loving kindness despaired that they could do no more, without being penetrated with the littleness of human life; without seeing again its realistic emblem in the grass which springeth up in the morning and in the evening is cut down and withereth? Yet there crept into the thought, as ever when it pauses puzzled, baffled, cast down, and set at naught in its finite reachings forth to grasp the infinite mystery, and even as a soft, inarticulate whisper from the Everlasting Throne might steal upon the ear, the ideal and aspiration of immortality.

That poor, shrunken form, hidden away beneath the flowers of the earth, did not seem to us to be him that we had known. Nor was it. Where the flash of intellect? Where the steadfast purpose graved upon the face? Where the smile of genuine, sweet nature? Dead, do we say? But we say not that of the electricity which has flashed its message through a wire and left the wire stolid and cold and dead and dumb. Neither can we say it of the soul, which has so left the body which it quickened.

That body is given back to its place—the dust from which it sprung—and there not to cease to be, but only to change its form and resolve into its elements. Whence goeth the soul that has left the body? In the dim centuries long bygone—before He spoke as never man spoke—the Greek answered, for he had pondered as we ponder yet, and even as the dead and forgotten generations pondered before him, and as the unborn generations will ponder after us; and thus he said:

That which has grown from the earth to the earth—
But that which has sprung from heavenly seed,
Back to the heavenly realms returns.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, in mid-ocean, on one of the great steamships, some years ago, a gentleman extended his hand and said: "I am GARRET A. HOBART, of New Jersey. I know you and want you to know me." Afterwards, in the confidences of fellow-passengers on the sea, he said: "The value of success is not so much in the things it enables you to do as the consideration it gives you in the minds of others. I have been successful, and I want that understood and appreciated." In this incident came out the character of the man. The freshness, the frankness, the unspoiled joy of the boy, as happy over the things which gave pleasure and importance to his friends, as he felt sure they would be over his own advancement.

The financial distress which caused hard times in 1894 and 1895 produced a widespread spirit of pessimism and despair. It resurrected the question, "Is life worth the living?" which had been discussed nightly at Athenian dinners in the time of Plato and Socrates. The doubt is not American. Its most emphatic affirmation is evidenced in the life and career of our friend. He was an illustration of what is possible under American conditions and with American opportunities, with equal laws for all, and no class or privilege barring the way to the highest places in the land. At 19 he was a graduate of Rutgers College, and for six years teaching school and studying law; and at 25 he was called to the bar and began his battle with and in the world. Without money or influence, but with brains, education, health, industry, and character, his was the typical beginning of most of the youth of our country. His confidence in himself and his future led to an early marriage and an ideal domestic life.

At 33 he was among the foremost citizens of his State in every department of its activities. He was a leader in his profession of the law and of his political party; he had been repeatedly honored by his fellow-citizens in positions of trust and power; he had accumulated a fortune and was Vice-President of the United States. The idle and the incompetent will find no comfort here for their favorite theory that life is luck. He had the good fortune to be descended from that mixed Dutch-English ancestry which has the inspiration of glorious traditions of civil and religious liberty, of literature and adventure, of art and arms, of indomitable endurance, of conquest over all obstacles, and of strenuous endeavor which no difficulties can discourage.

It was his happy lot to have his career to work out in this Republic and in the latter half of this marvelous nineteenth century. With these advantages, common to millions, fortune withdrew her assistance, and the brilliant example we contemplate was the result of the energy and ability of this fine specimen of a self-made man. At the threshold of his career, by profession and membership, he proclaimed himself a Christian, and as he began so he continued until his death, a consistent child of the Church. His was not the religion which in Jonathan Edwards's period filled the churches with terror and in our time empties their pews, but the religion of the Evangelist Moody, which rests upon the Golden Rule. Preferring always his own way, he recognized with a broad charity that the paths pursued by others led to the same heaven and could be more easily trod by them. He had no aggressive faith which fought on dogma other creeds and sects, but he was at all times active in the good works which are common to all creeds and all sects.

The scholar in politics is the familiar theme for academic discussion. His duty to participate all admit, his usefulness is often doubted. He too frequently lacks that touch with affairs and knowledge of men which are necessary to give him the weight in party councils due to his character and culture. The business man in politics is the hope of the present and future. The measures we carry here are reflected in the markets of the world and react upon the farm, the factory, the furnace, and the mine. Their influence for good or evil is felt in every home. They tie government and its policies so closely to the manufacturer, merchant, farmer, and mechanic that business is politics and politics is business. Men of fortune or of large affairs often affect contempt for those in public life and denounce with unbridled license the conduct of national, State, and municipal matters. They complain bitterly of taxes and the burden of government. They are entitled to no sympathy. They are suffering, if at all, from their own want of appreciation of their duties as citizens and of patriotism.

Mr. HOBART was, during his whole career, the lawyer and man of business, who keenly understood and laboriously lived up to a high ideal of citizenship. His party found him at the caucus and at the polls. He had time for conventions and public meetings. He could promote the best interests of his State by service in its legislature, or remain in retirement while working diligently for the nomination and election of those best fitted for the offices to be filled. Charles James Fox said of Edmund Burke that "he was right, but right too soon." His speeches emptied the House of Commons in his time, but in our day are text-book and manual for British statesmen. Statesmen and reformers of this prophetic order sow the seed, but they do not govern. Wendell Phillips, Lloyd Garrison, Lovejoy, and John Brown created conditions which made it possible for Lincoln to act. Successful leaders grapple with the workaday elements about them and, combining the conscience and intelligence of the hour, solve the problems which more immediately concern their constituents and their country.

The Vice-President was of this class. He was not troubled with illusions nor bound by theories. He pitied the man who perpetually longs for the good old times and mourns the decadence of the present, and sympathized with the far more useful one who is providing for the unborn millions of the coming century. His lot was with neither. Acute questions—financial, industrial, international, or moral—are always knocking at the door. Their settlement is vital to the position of the country among nations, or to the comfort and happiness of its people. Mr. HOBART was not a State builder nor a prophet, but he was among the master workmen who, as the years go by, slowly perfect the structure of government by providing for its present needs and are digging trenches or leading the assault against those who would destroy it.

The Joint Traffic Association was a conference of the thirty-seven railroads which carry the traffic of the country between the interior and the Atlantic coast. Their quarrels and rate cutting injured their investors, demoralized business, and promoted trusts. The members were not capitalists nor speculators, but the hard-headed and able managers of these corporations who had come up from the ranks and adopted the operation of railways as both a career and a profession. Their efforts to cure the evils of the situation were doomed to failure from the jealousies of large companies and the fear of small ones and the lack of any power to enforce their agreements.

By unanimous vote they selected GARRET A. HOBART as arbitrator. The questions submitted to him involved the revenue of the disputants and the movement by one route or another of a vast volume of freight. No judge ever held office by so precarious a tenure or had to decide more important matters. The defeated litigant could refuse to submit or, by carrying a charge of injustice, unfairness, or incapacity into the governing body, compel a resignation. As chairman of the association I was brought in frequent contact with him, his work, and its difficulties. He administered that judicial responsibility for three years, resigning during the first year of his Vice-Presidency. There could be no more significant tribute to his unfailing judgment, tact, and character than the remarkable fact that there was never an appeal from his decisions nor complaint of their fairness and justice. In this demonstration is found the secret of his success.

Very many in our country rise by their own exertions from nothing to affluence. The rapid evolutions caused by steam, electricity, and invention give numberless opportunities for the far-sighted and courageous to seize the hand of Fortune before their fellows know of her presence. These capable men of affairs are of two classes—the class who make what others lose and the class who benefit their associates or the community or the whole country by the developments they promote and the enterprises they create. The first are the pirates of society and of business. They are the fathers of communism and the foster fathers of anarchy. The others are among the benefactors of their time. It was the characteristic of our friend that, possessing the far-sighted faculty and having the sense and training to keep the curb of caution upon the promptings of acquisitiveness and imagination, he drew a large circle into his plans, and all shared in the profits of his undertakings.

The founders of the Republic meant to provide for a successor to the President who should be equally worthy of the Chief Magistracy; but the machinery they devised gave the Vice-President no voice in the Government, and created an inevitable antagonism between him and the President. It revived in a form the old historic struggle of the able and ambitious heir for recognition and influence in affairs of state. The contest began during our first Administration. Confidence and cordiality were impossible between the self-centered Washington and the imperious Adams. With Adams and Jefferson was the mutual repulsion of the Puritan and the cavalier. In Jefferson and Aaron Burr the revolutionist was seeking to destroy the patriot. The practical Jackson and the philosophic Calhoun were soon at war. The man of action threatened to hang the theorist if he carried his ideas to their logical conclusions.

With the growth of the country, the strength of parties and their internal dissensions, the Vice-Presidency was thrown to the friends of disappointed candidates and at disaffected States to select the nominee and be appeased. Fillmore and Arthur discarded the friends of the dead President, and Tyler and Johnson reversed their politics and policies. The power in control at the White House and in Congress sought to minimize the Vice-President and make him obscure and innocuous. Happily for Mr. HOBART there was no conflict over candidates in the convention which nominated William McKinley. The partisans of defined policies had selected him as their best exponent in advance. There were no disappointed and vengeful interests to be reconciled. The choice settled upon HOBART as the most fit and available running mate for the Ohio statesman.

Coming thus into this high office, his talent of common sense and his charm of personality made him, from the beginning, the friend and chosen counselor of the President. He lifted the office out of the rut of conventionality and possibility to a position of dignity, usefulness, and trust. He won the warm affection of his party associates and the esteem and respect of his party antagonists. He had the faculty of the wisely busy man of always having plenty of time, and that he shared with his friends in that hearty and healthy companionship which has made his name a hospitable memory at the Capitol. Though he died in his prime, with apparently years of usefulness before him, yet his was a full and rich life and a nobly rounded career. It is fitting that such a man should fall in battle with his armor on. The conspicuousness of his departure gives luster to his example. Statesman, citizen, husband, father, friend, the sum of his worth among us is that he performed with faithfulness and fidelity, with conscientious care and magnetic ardor, all the duties of public and private life.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I avail myself of the opportunity to-day to join in paying the last public tribute of respect, friendship, and affection to the memory of our late Vice-President, GARRET A. HOBART.

His busy, industrious, honorable, and successful life can well be held up as an exemplar to encourage, strengthen, and inspire the young of our great country.

A native of New Jersey, of English and Dutch parentage, born June 3, 1844, he graduated from Rutgers College in 1863, at the age of 19; then taught school and began the study of law; admitted to the bar in 1869; city counsel of Paterson in 1871; in the State legislature in 1873; reelected and made speaker in 1876; in the State senate in 1879, and in 1881 elected president of that body; reelected in 1882; a delegate at large to the Republican national conventions in 1876 and 1880; elected a member of the national committee in 1884, serving continuously until 1896, when nominated for Vice-President; elected and became Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate on March 4, 1897, a comparative stranger personally to many members of this body.

The office of Vice-President of the United States, under our Constitution, is a peculiar one. In the proceedings of the convention that framed our Constitution the office of Vice-President first appears in section 3 of the partial report of the committee of eleven, submitted September 4, 1787, which provided that "the Vice-President shall be ex-officio President of the Senate."

In its discussion Mr. Gerry said:

We might as well put the President himself at the head of the Legislature.

To this Gouverneur Morris replied:

The Vice-President, then, will be the first heir apparent that ever loved his father.

By our Constitution—"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term."

The constitutional qualifications for President and Vice-President are the same—a natural-born citizen "who shall have attained to the age of 35 years and been fourteen years a resident of the United States."

In the election of a Vice-President, "if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President. A quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice."

The only express authority given to the Vice-President is in these words: "The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but he shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided."

"In the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States," the Senate chooses a President pro tempore.

"In case of the removal of the President of the United States from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected."

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

No authority is given to fill any vacancy in the office of Vice-President in any case. When the office becomes vacant from any cause, it so remains until another Vice-President is elected. As President of the Senate the Vice-President presides over its deliberations and transactions of business according to the rules and regulations made by the Senate and sees to their enforcement. It is at times a trying and delicate position. In the one hundred and eleven years of our constitutional existence, on March 4, 1900, as a nation, there have been 28 Vice-Presidential terms, filled by 24 different persons. Four Vice-Presidents—John Adams, George Clinton, Daniel D. Tompkins, and John C. Calhoun—were each elected for two terms, and Clinton and Calhoun each with two different Presidents.

One Vice-President—Richard M. Johnson—failed of election by the Electoral College for the term 1837-1841 and was chosen by the Senate.

One Vice-President—John C. Calhoun—resigned on December 28, 1832.

Three Vice-Presidents—John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and Martin Van Buren—became Presidents of the United States to succeed the Presidents with whom they were respectively elected as Vice-Presidents.

Four Vice-Presidents became Presidents by the death of the Presidents—John Tyler, by death of President Harrison, April 4, 1841; Millard Fillmore, by the death of President Taylor, July 9, 1850; Andrew Johnson, by the death of President Lincoln, April 15, 1865, and Chester A. Arthur, by the death of President Garfield, September 19, 1881.

Twelve of our twenty-four Vice-Presidents were members of the Senate before or after they were Vice-Presidents. Of these twelve, eight, Aaron Burr, Martin Van Buren, Richard M. Johnson, John Tyler, George M. Dallas, William R. King, Henry Wilson, and Thomas A. Hendricks, were United States Senators before they were Vice-Presidents; one, John C. Calhoun, resigned the Vice-Presidency to become United States Senator; one, John C. Breckinridge, was Senator after his term as Vice-President; one, Hannibal Hamlin, resigned as Senator to become Vice-President and was afterwards Senator, and one, Andrew Johnson, was Senator before and after his Vice-Presidency and Presidency.

Six Vice-Presidents have died in office: George Clinton on April 20, 1812, Elbridge Gerry on November 23, 1814, William R. King on April 18, 1853, Henry Wilson on November 23, 1875, Thomas A. Hendricks on November 25, 1885, and GARRET A. HOBART on November 21, 1899. Two died in April and four in November.

One out of every four of our Vice-Presidents has died in office. This is a remarkably great mortality. Only two Vice-Presidents, Levi P. Morton and Adlai E. Stevenson, are surviving.

During my service in the Senate we have had seven Vice-Presidents, with only the two survivors.

Vice-President HOBART was one of the twelve Vice-Presidents who had never been a member of the Senate. He soon made himself familiar with the rules and methods of business of the Senate and proved himself to be a good parliamentarian. He was quick in disposing of the business on his desk and in facilitating the procedure of business before the Senate.

He was a man of decided abilities and varied and liberal attainments, with great firmness and decision. In discharging his duties he was eminently fair, impartial, able, and prompt, and by his genial temperament and charming personality was a most acceptable and popular President of the Senate.

It is no disparagement to the twenty-three distinguished Vice-Presidents and Presidents of the Senate who preceded him to say that he had few superiors as President of the Senate.

Personally he was the true gentleman—hopeful, pleasant, generous, and kind.

We shall miss him in this Chamber, but while life remains we shall cherish the kindest remembrance of GARRET A. HOBART, our late President of the Senate and friend.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, it is but natural that we should place our offering of affection upon the grave of our dear associate and friend who so recently presided over this body. It is fit that we shall pay tribute to the kindly and great qualities of the late Vice-President in this public manner.

We as Senators of the United States, comprising all shades of public opinion, coming from all sections of our common country, are animated by a common desire to do honor to the memory of this man whom we had learned to love, and to place upon the perpetual record of the Senate our tribute to his illustrious memory.

I feel that I but express the sentiment of every member of this body when I say that the few years of my acquaintance with GARRET A. HOBART have added to my love for the human race, and have stimulated every fiber of my being to a higher conception of the worth and value of a man of character. The entrance of the Vice-President into the fellowship of this body and his association with us in the administration of affairs have seemed to me to be of great benefit to every Senator.

Vice-President HOBART was an active man of the business world in which he lived. His integrity and good judgment were the bases of a reputation for ability, honor, and justice, which the entire people recognized. No one distrusted his sincerity. All who knew him instinctively relied upon his judgment. His life was stainless, and his whole career, active and successful as it was in every way, contained nothing which, dying, he could wish to blot. Nothing received his approval which was not just and right. I do not recall a single decision made by him in this body which was ever reversed.

He made no hasty rulings, nor did he indulge in careless opinions. Strong in convictions, and with the moral courage to express and be governed by them, he was always tolerant of the views of others. A keen, unerring judge of men, he was charitable in his judgment of them. I do not remember ever hearing a word from his lips or of reading any expression of his which would wound the heart or feelings of another. He was naturally and always broad minded, and his great heart was full of kindness and human sympathy. His loyalty to his friends reached in its intensity the point of genuine chivalry. He was an earnest speaker, an excellent and successful lawyer, and it is not strange that he was chosen by great interests to arbitrate their differences, as has been referred to to-day. He was by nature a judge and counselor.

Mr. President, the great mystery of death in all the ages has challenged the wisdom of men for its solution, and to-day, after countless efforts in consideration of the problem, mankind is quite as helpless and unsettled as it was six thousand years ago.

The approach of death, whether it appears in the silence and quiet of the peaceful home or in the midst of the thunder of battle, with the attendant struggle of warfare and carnage, always reaches the same result—ultimate rest, the rest and quiet of the grave.

The life of the busy, active public man, who has dealt with the affairs of his time with care and skill and good judgment, finds its close just as simply and certainly as that of the humblest person who wrought out his own salvation while on the earth. And yet this life of ours is but a stage upon the shores of time which leads to an eternal future. It is but the portal to a long home awaiting us. If the experiences which have accompanied us upon the earth have brought honor and fame and have given us comfort and peace in life, we may have just hope in the coming future.

Vice-President HOBART, in a degree beyond that of most men of his time, was active and powerful in his chosen field of labor. He built up a reputation for simple, honest performance of duty which all of us may well emulate. His passing from life was like that of a good man who had performed his duty upon the earth. He was not ashamed to meet his Judge. His was a story to be commended, a life to be loved and copied. The world was better for the presence of and the kindly life of GARRET A. HOBART.

A few months ago Vice-President HOBART was in the vigor of health. Disease seized upon him. He sickened and died. Such is the weakness of human life. Health, energy, power yesterday; death to-day. The great spirit of the great man is gone to the God who gave it. In his death the Senate has suffered a great loss. He was a man of wonderful qualities. Among these were energy, industry, judgment, courage, integrity, and great common sense. As the presiding officer of this body, no Senator, I am sure, ever felt for an instant that there was the slightest disposition on the part of the Vice-President to do or to allow an injustice.

The fact that the news of his untimely death brought to each member of this body the keen pain of personal bereavement is in itself a higher tribute than any Senator can express.

His close attachment for the President was as rare as it was generous and beautiful. The undisturbed harmony between the two was creditable to each, a gratification to our people. Mr. HOBART was a whole-hearted patriot. He loved his country, its institutions, and the flag. He had no false pride. He was a model citizen and an equally model official. He was never unmindful of duty and was rarely absent from the chair which by the people he had been called to fill. Indeed, we all know now that this sense of duty kept him at his post when the dictates of health enjoined otherwise.

Mr. President, in these days of trial—for they are days of trial—to all men charged with official duty it is well to dwell upon the examples of faithful, conscientious men, who strive to do right as God gives them to see the right. And a recital of the noble deeds and manly virtues of great men who pass away benefits the nation. The Vice-President loved justice. His sense of fairness made him the friend of the people and the people his friend. His love for fair dealing and common honesty was a natural sentiment and without doubt was the controlling reason which caused his influence to be sought by men of affairs and his methods to be followed high in the councils of the State and nation. That peculiar quality of clear-sightedness in important matters seemed to clothe him with wisdom in his official station and directed him with unerring certainty. His utterances as the presiding officer of the Senate were clear, correct, and never confused. His method of accurate statement impressed his associates with the force and strength of his opinions.

I have said that in his death the Senate suffered a great loss. The great event which took him from our midst in his strong manhood was a dispensation not easily borne by the members of the Senate. But the life we live imposes burdens upon all of us. We must assume and bear our responsibilities in order that we may become worthy of the rewards of our own lives. We must make friends with adversity and strike hands with sorrow that we may not forget our obligations to humanity. We can not determine that all our ways shall be cast in pleasant places, nor can we elect that we shall enjoy a future of peaceful quiet. But whatever betides us, let us bravely bear our responsibilities as he did, and submit, like him, without murmuring, to the burdens which may press upon us. Then may the future bring to us, as it did to him, the acclaim, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. President, we miss his genial presence, the ring of his cheerful voice, the warm grasp of his hand. He sleeps the sleep that knows no awakening, but he will live with us all in our memory. "Many times and oft" will we find ourselves looking for a face which we can not see and listening for a voice which we can not hear. But the grave is not the end. We look beyond to the great fact of immortality and we cling to the fact that we are immortal; that there is light and life beyond the grave, and, comforted by such reflections, we can say of departed friends:

Hail and farewell.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, so much has been said, and not too much, and said so well, concerning the character of the late Vice-President of the United States, that I shall conform to the strictest propriety if I limit my remarks to a brief statement of the impressions which that character produced upon me, impressions which will remain so long as I shall have the power to retain them.

As he appeared to me, Mr. HOBART was a man of very simple character. There were no intricacies in his composition; and yet the simple character has many moods and phases, and it will best serve my present purpose to consider him in certain several aspects in which that character presented itself. As presiding officer of this body his discharge of his functions was marked by great alertness of perception, a perfectly clear conception of what was transpiring, a simple impartiality in decision, and, above all, Mr. President, by an administrative ability which expedited the business of this body without precipitately hurrying it. This is no small commendation; and he possessed in an eminent degree those qualities which made him an ideal presiding officer.

Something has been said in the remarks that have preceded mine as to his influence as a Vice-President. I do not think, Mr. President—indeed, I do not know from anything I have ever read or heard—that any predecessor of Mr. HOBART has ever exercised over public affairs that marked and persistent and beneficial influence that he did. There was something in the large composition of the man which necessarily impressed itself upon every situation, social, business, or political, with which he was brought into contact. And accordingly we all felt here, irrespective of party, that our deliberations were being guided by a serene, just, and impartial intelligence, which we now miss so greatly because it has gone forever.

As a member of a great political party Mr. HOBART was a man of the clearest political convictions. He believed implicitly in the cardinal and axiomatic principles of that great organization, which to him were the directing forces toward national prosperity. He was tolerant of the opinions of others, but firm in the assertion of his own; and in a time of great national exigency, when the honor of this country was at stake, when its dignity was imperiled, and when its safety was not altogether assured, his influence was felt more than it was perceived by the senses—was powerfully influential in guiding not only the councils of his party, but the united councils of this nation in the events which preceded and which continued throughout the recent war.

But, Mr. President, it is always best to consider a character like Mr. HOBART, or any character, indeed, as a man, because after all it is as a man that history will consider the best and the bravest before she gathers up his ashes into her everlasting urn and impresses upon it her indelible inscription. As I said, he was a man of great simplicity of personal character. He had been fortunate in life in all respects. If aught has ever been said against him, I never heard of it or saw it in print. He seems to have pursued the even tenor of his way among his neighbors and also in the lofty walks of public life unscathed by criticism, unaltered by adverse report. What his purposes were in the long life which seemed to lay before him I do not know. Doubtless he had ambitions. He had a right to have them. He might well, like the dark astrologer aspiring for empire, have consulted the stars in their course and said:

Is it wrong to make the fancy minister to hope,
To fill the air with pretty toys of air,
And clutch fantastic scepters moving toward me?

But if he had such ambitions, Mr. President, they were noble ambitions. If he sought popularity, it was the popularity which was aspired to by Lord Mansfield—that which follows and not that which is run after. He was entitled to conceive and cherish the loftiest ambitions. Life seemed to spread out all beautiful and most extended before him. It passed almost in an hour.

But irrespective of any dreams of ambition or of the future in any aspect which he may have entertained, he had assured to him and he died in the full enjoyment of that which is superior to and more precious than the realization of any dream of that kind. In that heaven on earth known as home, in all of his social relations, in the prosperity of his material conditions, in everything which goes to make up a happy and contented life, he had entitled himself, and had "honor, love, obedience, troops of friends," without having to wait for that old age in which these things are hoped for.

But, Mr. President, he has left us. He will not return to us, but we shall go to him. He has penetrated the cloud. He has gone beyond the curtain. He has solved the great riddle which mankind for generations and generations has been reading in vain, and it only remains to say that the sacred soil of his State, which has gathered into its unreturning bosom for generations from colonial times, through Revolutionary times, and through all the history of our Government, the bodies of so many noble men, scholars, patriots, and men of affairs, holds no more sacred form than that of GARRET A. HOBART.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the century which has just closed has enfolded in its archives the names of a large number of magnificent men, but I doubt if in its vast sweep across the area of time it has recorded the history of a more perfectly rounded American character than that of GARRET A. HOBART. That is a very great character, Mr. President. It had its origin centuries ago. It has been improving in its characteristics, its attributes, its strength, and its perfectness during all the time since it first was known to the world—the character of an American citizen. The public requirements of American character have been increasing in their intensity from year to year and century to century, so that a public man who is brought in contact with the universal observation of mankind in a great office such as Mr. HOBART held undergoes the close, careful inspection of all classes of these seventy-five or eighty millions of people, and that observation extends even farther than our own continent and reaches to other countries. Now, when it can be said of an American brought under this great lens of inspection that he has stood the test in every particular, that he has proved himself worthy of this lofty citizenship and the confidence of this great people, what higher eulogy can the tongue of man pronounce upon him?

Mr. HOBART appeared to me to be as nearly a perfect representation of the manhood, of the grandeur, of the nobility of this American character as any man I have ever read of—certainly as nearly as any man I have ever seen. In establishing this great position for himself we find that he had no adventitious aid. It has been the work of the development of a noble nature under institutions suited to its perfection. So that in his character and in his conduct this Government receives honor and praises among men.

It has been said here that we miss him from the Senate. We do miss him, not because his place can not be supplied among the great Americans who might be put in his position, but unfortunately in our system of government there is no opportunity to supply the loss, and it is a very serious matter, particularly to the Senate of the United States. Twice have I witnessed this occurrence since I have had a place in this body. The Government of the United States, and particularly the Senate, loses one of its great balancing and determining powers on the death of the Vice-President. There is no opportunity to substitute him in his power to give a casting vote on matters of legislation or in confirmations to office. It sometimes happens—yes, very often happens in circumstances of political exigency—that the vote of the Vice-President of the United States is necessary to determine questions in which the people of the present age and of coming generations are profoundly interested.

In this respect his office is higher in its importance than that of the President of the United States and is nearer to the people, as the legislative power, in which the Vice-President may participate, is higher than the veto power of the President.

In his person the people at large have their only direct representative in the lawmaking power of Congress, and it is a grand thought that their will, expressed in the vote of the Vice-President, decides all questions when the Senate is equally divided.

We have lost that power out of the Senate, and while we can supply, and do supply from our own body, a presiding officer who is worthy of the situation in every possible respect, we can not confer upon the presiding officer the power to cast a vote in case of an equal division of the Senate. So that in his death under the circumstances the Government is bereaved and the Senate has lost an immense force. It may turn out not to be unfortunate. At the same time it is the striking out of a wheel or a power in the Government of the United States which we can not supply, and in that respect I look upon the death of our Vice-President as a great public calamity.

It was his honor to participate, as has been remarked here to-day, in some of the most eventful facts in the history of the American Union. It has been many years, Mr. President, if ever, since any Vice-President from that desk announced the passage of a measure of greater importance than that which declared war against Spain. Out of the passage of that bill has come the emancipation of races, scattered almost around the entire world, from Bourbon rule; from that last remnant of tyranny, which now has departed forever from this hemisphere, and, I may say, from the Pacific Ocean. That was a great opportunity to GARRET A. HOBART, and I wish he could have lived to realize, as he would have realized, the great blessings that will flow to mankind from that grand declaration.

But it seems that it was not the will of Providence that this beautiful character should dwell among us longer. It was our good fortune that we should have the benefit of his councils and his example. If any man within my acquaintance has ever been taken away from happier circumstances than those which surrounded him I am unconscious of it. He abounded in wealth built up by his own hands, so that he really lived under his own vine and fig tree, planted with his own hands. He was surrounded by family ties such as few men in the world boast of or ever enjoy, ties that were the tenderest and the truest that a noble woman can create about the heart of true man. He had the universal friendship of this grand Republic, from the greatest to the least, without distinction of persons and without stint.

Upon his magnificent form sat the very beauty of health, power, and the glory of a splendid manhood. There was nothing needed by GARRET HOBART, it seemed to me, to make his life completely happy. But he was called, as all men must be called. It has frequently occurred to me that it ought to have been painful to him to separate himself from the good fortunes by which he was surrounded here, but when he was called he answered like a child called by its mother or father and said, "Here, Lord, am I," and he passed away from this life without a regret, it seems, except on the part of those who knew him and loved him.

No smoother, quieter, or more gentle death has any man died in this land, and when we come to understand how and why it was, as explained by the Senator from New York [Mr. DEWEY] to-day, we find that he lived and acted a Christian life; not professing Christianity and failing to observe its injunctions, but he lived a Christian life, and "his works do follow him." So when the summons came to this magnificent man he quietly laid down all of the splendors, all of the attractions, all of the charms of life, called his family about him and bade them quietly adieu, having made all preparations for the disposal of his body after death. Who would not say, "Let my last end be like his"?

He has left in this Chamber, Mr. President, a very sweet memory; one not merely honored, but a memory that is beloved by his associates here. I have never heard a criticism or ill-natured remark made about GARRET A. HOBART while he was Vice-President and in the occupancy of the Presidency of the Senate. It is wonderful that under his Presidency we could pass through the scenes that we have here, wrought up almost to the pitch of exasperation at times by party conflicts and differences of opinion about matters of the greatest possible moment—wonderful that in the midst of all our excitements we were all the friends, the warm personal friends, of the late Vice-President of the United States.

In that illustrious roll of great statesmen, some of whom have impressed themselves upon the world until, we may well say, their memory will last for all time, there is the last name, which we honor to-day, who was unpretending in his course of life, who appeared not to be an ambitious man, but who carried wisdom and justice in his bosom and friendship in his heart, love for his race, his fellow-man, and for his country.

As he loved us, so we love and revere his memory.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, in paying my tribute of respect and affection to the memory of our late Vice-President, I am naturally reminded of his relations and those of Mrs. Hobart to the State of New Hampshire. As Merrimack County, during the closing years of the last century, was the pioneer region of the Granite State, where Daniel Webster first saw the light of day, with the smoke from no hearthstone rising over the frozen hills between the rude chimney of his father's home and the settlements on the rivers of Canada, so during the earlier years of the present century Coos County was the frontier section, close up to the Canadian border, narrowed almost to a point by the eager pressure of the Green Mountain boys of Vermont on the west and the sturdy woodsmen of Maine on the east. In this county of Coos, in its primitive days, strong and God-fearing men and women pierced the damp wilderness, conquered the frosts and snowdrifts, tilled the rough and rocky land, and went on amid such surroundings to cultivate and develop the noblest aspirations for themselves and their descendants for their State and their country.

Born in this county of Coos from English and New York ancestry, Addison W. Hobart, son of Roswell Hobart, as a boy, moved to New Jersey and became a school-teacher, later a prosperous and respected merchant. From the same frontier county of Coos also went to New Jersey one of her best sons, Socrates Tuttle, who became likewise a school-teacher and afterwards a lawyer of ability, eminence, and success. From the families of these two New Hampshire men, who were intimate friends in their new home, came GARRET A. HOBART, for whom we now mourn, and his helpful and devoted wife, in the presence of whose sacred grief we should to-day speak with the utmost tenderness and sympathy.

The Vice-President was a man of rare gifts of person, mind, and manners; never acting with boisterous force in affairs nor with fierce energy in oratory, but possessed of the highest native intelligence, assisted by the most ample culture and marvelously blessed with the most potent ability to meet the strongest men of the country in business negotiations, in legal contests, and in political management, and to control and influence their actions according to his plans and desires. He was fortunate in his preparatory education, and also in his college course, which ended at an early age and gave him an opportunity, like his father and his wife's father, to fasten his hold upon what he had learned and to prepare to make use of it with readiness and power through that best of discipline, which has helped to form the characters and give success to the careers of so many of America's public men—a period of patient service as a school-teacher.

Then he studied law, entered upon its practice, and became successful as a lawyer before he interested himself in the political struggles of his city, county, and State. He had valuable training during repeated terms of service in the legislature, and while presiding as the chosen official head in each of its branches he enjoyed unusual opportunities for the complete exercise and improvement of his highest faculties. It was through all these experiences, doing his part well in every function, whether small or large, that he made himself wise and cautious, able and strong, cultivated perfect self-control, secured the supreme confidence of his associates in every station, and finally came to exhibit those traits of character which gave to him the supreme successes of his life, his worldly riches, and his last and highest public honors, those of the Vice-Presidency.

My own personal relations with Mr. HOBART, beginning with political associations of many years ago, were most cordial, based upon that mutual respect which is essential, I think, to perfect friendship; and those relations were without a break or a flaw at any time. I am therefore not willing now to coolly analyze his mental characteristics or to speak discriminately of his merits in private life and in public station. For such a purpose this date is too near the time of his obsequies, where we saw so many of his countrymen coming from miles around his home, quietly thronging the streets of Paterson and giving mute recognition of the great loss that had come to them through the death of their most distinguished citizen. Their affection for him brought them to his bier; and it is only of that side of his character which evoked such affection that I am willing to speak to-day.

Sometimes it is possible that kind and tender hearted men are too weak for the great affairs of life, private and public. Yet it can not be successfully maintained as a general assertion that the strong men of this world have been unamiable in their relations either with their families or their fellows. In truth, the contrary, I think, is the case. Those who have been the sweetest and gentlest of men in ordinary life have been also the strongest and the bravest when great and worthy exigencies have called upon them for courageous action. It must not be said only of the warriors that—

The bravest are the tenderest—
The loving are the daring.

It may be also said of those in civic station that some of the noblest and most heroic deeds of history have been performed by the quietest and most affectionate of men.

At all events, he whose career we now eulogize never was called weak or undecided when strength and decision were needed. He had sufficient will power and could strenuously exert himself whenever the occasion required him to do so. Does anyone doubt that in any possible emergency of life that we can conceive of in which he might have been called to act firmness and strength of character would have been shown sufficient to stamp him as one of the strongest of men?

But how gentle was his nature to all around him. His joyous looks, his smiles of humor, his words of greeting, commendation, and advice made him the most pleasing of comrades, the truest, sweetest, and dearest of friends. No effort is needed at this moment on the part of any one of us who has served with him in this Chamber to see him, in the mind's eye, courteously and graciously presiding over the Senate, heeding the rights of all, giving to everyone his due, offending no one, and drawing to himself a respect and affection from all his companions which will never fade as long as his memory lingers in their minds and hearts.

The thoughts of our departed friend should always be accompanied by a vivid faith that he is immortal, is even now with all his heart and soul serving the Creator of his being in a world more wonderful, more glorious and happier than this in which we are left behind. Such faith in a future state can not be driven from the minds of men. That it is given to us to see in this life, even with limited vision, the countless stars of heaven, each one the center of a solar system like that which we call our own, whose vastness appalls the mind with its visible immensity; that we are allowed to perceive the wonders of the earth and ocean, what God has created and what man has wrought; that we are permitted to know and feel the reality of the existence of the souls of men and each one the existence of his own soul; and yet that at the end of a short stage of being on this planet we are doomed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, when the mere body dies, to be annihilated, to be known no more by others, to become ourselves forever unconscious—nobody believes in such a cruel fate for all mankind. Everyone has hope and faith in immortality. The change is to be a solemn one, but who would prefer annihilation?

Nor are we in the life to come to be merely disembodied spirits. Such a transition is not conceivable. We are to possess material bodies, not the same we now have, less earthy, more spiritual, than those, we trust, but still material bodies, exploring the great physical orbs about us, learning what they are, beginning to comprehend the mysteries of their vastness. Then also shall we meet those who have gone before us.

When the mists have risen above us,
As the Father knows his own;
Face to face with those who love us,
We shall know as we are known.

We may clasp hands with the Master; and—who can tell?—possibly in some far-off time, yet after a period short compared with the full measure of our immortal existence, we may be permitted humbly to look upon the great white throne and Him who sits thereon. Without a doubt I believe that our friend whom we have lost here now lives—the same soul that we knew and loved—but endowed with a new body and a glorified spirit, inhabiting some one of the stars which nightly shine upon us, impress us with a deep conviction of our immortality, and subdue us into awe and reverence for the great Creator of the universe.

The city of our God
Her gates shall open wide,
And through her streets and portals broad
Shall pour a living tide.

There no more night shall be,
And death shall reign no more;
There shall be no more sea,
No partings on the shore.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the death of Mr. HOBART was both a loss to the country and a deep personal sorrow to his friends, of whom no man ever had more. Of the qualities of mind and heart which make it possible to say this without going beyond the limits of simple truth, there is much to be said. But there was one conspicuous public service rendered by Mr. HOBART which I think has not been understood, and certainly has not been adequately appreciated. He restored the Vice-Presidency to its proper position and lifted it up before the people to the dignity and importance which it merits. The decline of the Vice-Presidency in political weight and popular estimation has been an unfortunate development of the last fifty years. In our regard for that office and in our treatment of it we have departed utterly from the wise conception of the founders of our Government. The framers of the Constitution intended that the Vice-President should be, in all respects, in ability, in reputation, in weight of character, and in his standing before the people, on a plane of absolute equality with the President. We have but to turn to the original clause of the Constitution, amended so long ago that it is well-nigh forgotten, and there find the proof of this statement.

In that clause it was provided that the electors in each State should vote for two persons from different States without naming the office voted for, and that the man receiving the highest vote in all the electoral colleges should be President and the one receiving the next highest should be Vice-President. In other words, the electors were to vote for two men who were equally fit to be President, and one was to have the first and the other the second place. This system led to the tie between Jefferson and Burr in 1801, the dangerous intrigue in the House to supplant the former by the latter, and the consequent amendment of the Constitution compelling the electors to indicate the office voted for. The amendment was undoubtedly necessary, but it does not touch in any way the original conception of the makers of the Constitution, nor should it ever have been allowed to affect it.

According to that conception, the Vice-President, placed on equal level in choice, was to be a man not only fit to succeed to the Presidency in case of death or disability, but was marked out by his position as the natural successor when the four or the eight years' term of his associate had expired. In this way Adams succeeded Washington and Jefferson succeeded Adams. Then, again, after a long interval, Van Buren went from the Vice-Presidency to the White House. Since that time the conception of the framers has faded and grown dim. The Vice-Presidency has been treated too often by party conventions either as a convenient and honorable shelf upon which an eminent man might quietly close his career, or as a consolation prize to be awarded to the faction in the party which had failed to win the highest place. In the first case the country ran the risk of having a Vice-President incapable, from age or perhaps other causes, of carrying the responsibilities of the Presidency if they were forced upon him; and in the second they had a Vice-President who lived in strained and distant relations with the White House, and if suddenly called to occupy it brought a change of men and of measures when the people had voted for policies and executors of policies who should be continuous in action for four years.

So far has this misconception and this false treatment of the Vice-Presidency gone that it is almost universally looked upon as certain political extinction for any man with a career before him, still more with hopes of the Presidency, to accept the second place in the Government, to which he is chosen by the votes of the entire American people. Such ideas and such a practice are bad for the Government, complete perversions of the intentions of the framers, and breed conditions which are potentially dangerous. Out of this neglect and misconception Mr. HOBART silently lifted his great office merely by the manner in which he filled it and performed its duties. Quietly, firmly, and with perfect tact he asserted the dignity of his high position, never going too far and always far enough. Without knowing exactly why, people suddenly came to realize that there was a Vice-President of the United States, that he held the second position in the Government, and that, with the exception of the President, he was the only man in the country holding office by the vote of the entire people. In the same way the old and true conception of the Vice-Presidency in relation to the Administration reappeared. Instead of holding aloof or remaining indifferent to the conduct of the Government, Mr. HOBART regarded himself as a part of the Administration and as a representative of the policies which that Administration had been chosen to carry into effect—as one of the President's friends, advisers, and supporters, equally interested with him in the success of the measures to which they were alike committed.

As presiding officer of the Senate he fulfilled carefully and thoroughly every duty of the place. He abandoned once for all the bad habit which had grown up of submitting nearly every question of order to the Senate and ruled promptly and well on all these points, as every presiding officer ought to do. In these ways he steadily elevated the Vice-Presidency in the estimation of the people, and made the office what the framers of the Constitution intended it to be.

When he came to Washington he was but little known to the people of the United States outside his native State of New Jersey. When he died the whole country grieved, not because the Vice-President was dead, but because GARRET HOBART was gone, who had in a time only too brief impressed himself upon them as a worthy holder of a great office and as a distinguished public man.

It may be that we shall drift back into the old and false idea which has grown up about the Vice-Presidency. It may be that again it will be treated as an office for someone about to retire from public life, as a consolation prize to a defeated faction, but should this happen I can not believe that it will last, and there will certainly be no excuse for it now, because Mr. HOBART demonstrated plainly to all men the real greatness and importance of the office and has shown that it ought to be one of the great prizes of political life, to be desired by our most ambitious men, and regarded not only for its intrinsic importance, but as a stepping-stone to higher honors. That a man in two years could do this is the strongest evidence of an unusual force of character and of abilities of no common order.

I have dwelt at length upon this point because it has seemed to me that it showed in a very marked way what manner of man Mr. HOBART was. There is, however, much more to be said. I did not have the good fortune to know Mr. HOBART until he came to the Vice-Presidency, but during his service here I came to know him well and to regard him as a most valued friend, and to hope that he had given his friendship to me. He had an unusual capacity for winning affection. No one, I think, could be closely associated with him without becoming sincerely attached to him. His invariable good temper, his cheerful disposition, his sense of humor, his love of fun, all made him a most attractive companion, but beneath these agreeable attributes were much stronger qualities.

In the trying days which preceded the Spanish war, when the country was moving surely toward the last resort of nations, and when doubts and hesitations were apparent in many directions, Mr. HOBART revealed himself to me as a man of strong sense and with a clearness of vision which showed him to be a statesman. When perplexing questions were upon him, he showed in a marked degree that highest of qualities, veracity of mind. He was never muddled with words, entangled with phrases, or lost in the mist of fine sentiments. He never mistook words for things. He saw facts exactly as they were and dealt with them accordingly. He knew that in the conduct of the Government, and especially in times of war, it was sometimes necessary for the public good to disregard individual feelings. However unpleasant such a duty might be, he would not shrink from it, and he never hesitated to tell a needed truth if it was for the benefit of the country, although his tact was such that personal enmity never followed.

I trust and believe that when the history of the momentous times in which he rendered his greatest public services comes to be written he will receive the very high meed of praise which he deserves. Those who knew him and saw him in that eventful period know well what he did and appreciate at their right value the courage, loyalty, and ability which he displayed. We mourn him as a friend, as an eminent and patriotic public servant, faithful to his country in all relations of life. His death, while he was still in his prime, was a grievous loss, not only to those who loved him, but to the country which he loved and which he served so well.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I did not learn of the date of the eulogies on Vice-President HOBART in time to prepare any elaborate statement upon his life and character. I will limit myself to a brief but sincere tribute of affection and esteem to his memory. I will touch upon his character only as it was exhibited here. I had not that personal acquaintance with the Vice-President which would warrant me in any extended remarks upon his inner life.

But, Mr. President, there are abundant opportunities to discover what material a man is made of when he is placed in the position that Vice-President HOBART was. He was in daily contact with the members of this body; he had to pass upon questions of great moment; and however much his position would seem to screen him from that scrutiny into character which the ordinary man affords, yet there was abundant and ample opportunity to know and to judge of his great merits.

Mr. President, as a presiding officer of this body Vice-President HOBART could be truthfully said to be an ideal one. His judgments were characterized by clearness and comprehension, and by a trait which is rarely possessed—of absolute impartiality. He was a partisan, as all adherents to great political parties are; but in the discharge of his duties as President of this body he was absolutely impartial. It mattered not what the question was, it mattered not whether there was an opportunity to catch the nearest way for political advantage, in every ruling of his it was at once perceived that he was animated solely by the honorable and high purpose to discharge the functions of his great office as befitting the Vice-President of the whole United States and not as the adherent or partisan of any party. The smoke of the battle between adherents and the shoutings of the captains never ascended to the chair which he occupied. There all was calm and serene; justice and impartiality presided there.

Now, Mr. President, with the limited scope of my observation, I can truthfully say that no more kindly or courteous man ever presided over any deliberative assembly in these United States. His kindness of disposition, his courteousness of demeanor, impressed everyone that came in contact with him. There was no show; there was no pretense; but there was the simple performance of duty by an American elevated to his high position. And, Mr. President, it is one of his highest praises that he was of the noblest and purest type of American manhood, American virtue, American patriotism, American justice, and American impartiality in the discharge of the functions of his great office.

This simple tribute of mine, Mr. President, is sincere. I speak with absolute sincerity in all the remarks that I have made about the deceased Vice-President. I know that his character and his qualities have been portrayed before the Senate to-day in language too eloquent for me to attempt to rival or to equal. I know that they have uttered the living truth. I know that no word of praise that has fallen from the lips of those who have eulogized the deceased Vice-President has been said beyond the truth. I know that all the Senators who have addressed us to-day upon the life of our departed President have been animated solely by a desire to pay their tribute of respect and admiration which we all, as American Senators, feel to the memory of the late Vice-President.

The old Latin maxim, De mortuis nil nisi bonum, is surely inapplicable to Vice-President HOBART. His armor of character is so perfect as not to be penetrable by the tongue of detraction however keen, nor by the pen of criticism however hostile. Armed with this character of truth and honor, kindness and courtesy, impartiality and justice, detraction and criticism are alike baffled to find a flaw in the admirable type of manhood which he exhibited.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, occasions like this rob me of what little power of speech nature has given me; and yet I feel that I would not be doing my full duty, occupying the peculiar political attitude I do in this Chamber, if I should now fail to say a word commemorative of the life and virtues of our deceased Vice-President.

My acquaintance with Mr. HOBART began, of course, March 4, 1897. It ended March 4, 1899, having extended through the three memorable sessions of the Fifty-fifth Congress. I had heard of him before his nomination to the Vice-Presidency. I had known of him as one citizen would know of a distinguished citizen living in a distant part of the nation. But I had never met him, and I knew of him more particularly as a prominent Republican in high favor with his party on the Atlantic seaboard.

There was nothing in common between the late Vice-President and myself politically; we were antipodal. He was a most pronounced Republican; I an equally pronounced Populist. He believed in the doctrines of his party; I did not and do not. He did not believe in the doctrines of my party. And yet, Mr. President, on this solemn occasion it affords me a mournful pleasure to be able to testify to the high personal worth and character of this distinguished citizen. There was much in the character of GARRET A. HOBART that was lovable. He was a sincere and truthful man. He was an intelligent and honest man, always actuated by the highest and purest of motives.

It is sometimes said that men are not entitled to any particular mention or credit for discharging their duties. I do not believe in that saying. In these days and in this generation, where greed is pushing for power and sometimes abusing it, to find one of pronounced political proclivities and opinions who can withstand the appeals and the cajolery of his party and discharge his duty fully and well in the face of public sentiment is so rare as to require recognition and notice.

Of course my acquaintance with the distinguished deceased was not such as to permit me to speak at length of his virtues. And yet, Mr. President, it is not necessary to have known a man throughout his entire career to enable one to form something of an estimate of his character and his characteristics. The late Vice-President was a typical American. There was nothing of snobbishness in his character. Whatever he was upon the surface, it was noticeable by all men. He was a product not only of the soil in which he sleeps, but he was a product of American institutions, and was thoroughly American in all his habits, thoughts, instincts, and purposes.

I feel, Mr. President, something of a personal loss in the death of Mr. HOBART. When he, on the 4th of March, 1897, stood at the desk you now occupy and I listened to his address to this Chamber and to the country, there came over me a thought that possibly this man intends to revolutionize the rules and violate the traditions of the Senate that had stood unchallenged for over a hundred years. I now recognize that possibly I was oversuspicious and somewhat hypercritical at the time. As time wore on and I became more familiar with this distinguished citizen I learned his many virtues and his high character. I found him to be a man of supreme courage at all times and under all circumstances, dealing justly with all Senators and with all having business before this great body.

I would say, Mr. President, my estimate of Mr. HOBART is that he possessed in a rare degree those qualities which would make a judicial officer. His temperament was judicial. While he was rapid and accurate in the transaction of business, he was always just and considerate of the rights and welfare of others.

Mr. President, on more than one occasion this friend of ours showed me acts of kindness that it would be impossible for me to forget; and throughout the years, whether they be few or many, that may be allotted to me on earth I shall look back to the Fifty-fifth Congress with kindly recollections of this distinguished man, who has been untimely taken from his family and his country.

Death, Mr. President, is a peculiar thing. Men are born to die, and they die to live again. I am of that number who believe in the immortality of the human soul and in the undying faith of the Christian. Our friend is not dead. He has simply passed through a transition state that will enable him to live in glory and immortality. To his wife and to his child goes out the unfeigned sympathy of the people of this nation, regardless of station, regardless of political alignment. His memory is sacred to all. And the saddest of all is that he was called before his time from the scenes of life and the active duties incumbent upon him.

Mr. President, it would be useless for me to say more. If I were to write the epitaph of this distinguished man, I would chisel upon the shaft that stands above his mortal remains the words: "Here lies an honest man, the noblest work of God."

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the State of New Jersey mourns with the Union of all the States in the untimely death of her distinguished son, GARRET A. HOBART. Great as the loss has been to the nation, the blow has fallen with heavier force and with the sense of a personal and intimate loss upon the people of the city and State among whom his busy and useful life has been spent. He was born in the State of New Jersey. His youth and early manhood, his college days, and the ripening seasons of his life were passed amid the familiar scenes and the friendly faces of his native home, and at the last, when the inevitable summons came, he died in the city which mourned him as its most illustrious citizen and in the State to which he brought so much honor and distinction. If the State gave him birth and education, training and experience, home and success, he, too, was generous to New Jersey, for he brought new honors to the old Commonwealth, he reflected new glory upon its career, already bright with the achievements of the distinguished patriots who had preceded him, and he returned with thousandfold interest the bounty of his generous parent.

His was a life of usefulness. All his abilities centered about that pivot of action and conduct. He believed that the only aristocracy and the true aristocracy was the aristocracy of useful men and useful women. He lived loyally by that principle through all his days. He exemplified it in his boyhood among the farms of Monmouth County. It was the principle which guided him through his undergraduate days at Rutgers College. It animated his early life as a law student and as a follower of the law. It was the magic wand which brought him the gifts of success in all his undertakings, in his private and domestic life, in his business and political career, and, finally, in the lofty sphere of public activity to which at the call of the people he was summoned. He had not only the desire to be useful, but he knew how to be useful. There was no waste of effort either in his intention or in the application of it. He was not led aside into bypaths. He followed the direct road to usefulness by the shortest route. Thus he accomplished great deeds of usefulness for his city, his State, and his country. It was the legacy he most desired to leave for his fellow-citizens.

Loyalty was no less a striking feature of his character. He came of a loyal, patriotic ancestry, and the influence of that heritage was manifest in all the phases of his busy, useful life. He was loyal to his home, to his city, to his State, and to his country. He was loyal to the great principles of liberty upon which the fathers founded this Government. From his early youth he was led to believe in the wisdom, the justice, and the patriotism of the Republican party. He never swerved in his loyalty to that belief, and all the activities of his energetic political career were devoted to the maintenance and the strengthening of that party and its principles. He was loyal to his friends because he believed friendship to be a sacred association. He was loyal to his country because he believed that within the United States God in His wisdom had established the highest and noblest form of government yet given to man. He served his country, his fellow-man, and his God with a loyalty that marked him as a man apart.

From his young manhood he had taken a deep interest in public affairs. With him this inclination seemed to be the outcome of a special genius for public and political life. He might, indeed, have spent all his days in the public service from the day when fresh from his law studies he was summoned to political office in his own city and county. The ability with which these earlier tasks were discharged made clear the path before him when it was desirable in the interests of his constituency that he should represent his county in the State legislature. In the legislative halls of his own State he rapidly made an enviable reputation as a faithful legislator, a wise public servant, and a man whose integrity and honesty of purpose no man ever questioned. He was barely over 30 when he was chosen speaker of the assembly. A few years later he became president of the senate. In both these positions he displayed the same grasp of parliamentary practice, the same dispatch of public business which were so strongly revealed in his career as presiding officer of this body.

Gradually, step by step, he increased his sphere of activity and influence. He became a power in the politics of his own State. He became a factor in the politics of the nation. For years he represented the State of New Jersey on the national Republican committee, and during all this time he worked with unceasing energy for the success of the party and its candidates wherever they might be. His political acumen became traditional. His judgment on political matters was regarded as unerring. His loyalty was a constant inspiration. His zeal accomplished results where others failed. Not a few of the successes of the Republican party in New Jersey and elsewhere were due to the remarkable combination of qualities and activities found in GARRET A. HOBART.

Popularity came to him as naturally as if it were an endowment of his birth. He made friends as easily as he kept them. To meet him was to come under the influence of a gentle, lovable, sunny, affectionate nature such as few men have the fortune to possess. Strong as he was in his beliefs, courageous as he was in his convictions, and unyielding in his sense of right and honor, it seemed impossible for him to make an enemy. He dwelt in an atmosphere which impelled men toward him. Add to this a mental equipment of the highest order, and the secret of his success in winning success is disclosed.

The people of his own State knew him and loved him long before his great and good qualities as a man and as a statesman became known to all men. New Jersey had tried him through a long period of years. In everything he had been called upon to do for his State or for his people he had done more than the full measure of his duty. He had always surpassed even the fond expectations of those who expected the most of him. He had endeared himself, as few sons of New Jersey have ever done, to all the people of his State, and when the national convention of Republican delegates summoned GARRET A. HOBART to be a standard bearer with William McKinley, New Jersey felt that at last her honored son had come into the legacy that was his and her due.

How the Vice-President bore himself since that day in July, 1896, when he was called upon to be a candidate for the second highest office in the gift of the people it is not my province to attempt to describe. I am here to-day to testify to the love that New Jersey bore for her distinguished and lamented son—gone, alas, too early to his long rest; to testify to the honor and distinction that Vice-President HOBART conferred upon the State, which mingles tears over his untimely departure with pride for his illustrious career. Well might New Jersey and the nation engrave this epitaph over his grave:

To live in hearts we leave behind
Is not to die.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I move, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Vice-President, that the Senate do now adjourn.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DANFORD.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to vacate the order made on yesterday for eulogies on my late colleague, Mr. DANFORD, of Ohio, fixed for to-morrow. I hold in my hand a telegram from his successor, Mr. GILL, who states that it is impossible for him to be present at that time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order referred to by the gentleman from Ohio will be vacated.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BOOKS FOR THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I present the following unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and ask immediate consideration of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which will now be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the resolution of the House, No. 32, providing that the Superintendent of Documents be requested to furnish the House of Representatives, for the use of the House Library, 50 copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the same number of the supplements thereto, report the same back with the recommendation that it pass, when amended as follows:

Line 5, after "50," insert "2."

At the end of line 8 add the following: "two of which supplements shall be for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary."

Also resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary the indexed Digest of United States Reports, in three volumes, published by The Lawyers' Cooperative Publishing Company, volumes 57 to 59, inclusive, of The Federal Reporter, 1 copy of Standard Unabridged Dictionary, Bouvier's Law Dictionary, last edition, and English Encyclopedia of Law, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The Revised Statutes of the United States and supplements thereto are published by the Government and kept for sale by it. There are now on hand a large number of copies, and the same can be furnished without expense. In 1886 100 copies were furnished for the use of the House Library, but the most of these have disappeared, and but few copies remain, not enough to supply the calls of members, who are frequently greatly inconvenienced. This is also true of the supplements. The Committee on the Judiciary has 3 copies of the Revised Statutes, but only 1 copy of the supplement, and at least 3 are needed. Hence the amendment providing for 2 copies for the use of that committee.

The Committee on the Judiciary almost daily necessarily refers to the Federal Reporter. It already has in the committee room permanently the first 57 volumes of the 97 published. That committee is greatly delayed and seriously inconvenienced in its work by being compelled to send to the general library for these volumes. Only two copies of each volume are kept there, and frequently these are found in use by the members of the House or by the Court, and hence can not be had when wanted. That committee has a complete set of the Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, but no recent or complete digest. That published by The Lawyers' Cooperative Publishing Company is concededly the best and can be had at an expense of $20.

Questions of law are constantly before that committee, especially when it is in session, and as it meets twice each week some general work in the nature of an encyclopedia of the law is absolutely essential. The Encyclopedia of English and American Law is the best and really the only work of the character suggested.

A good law dictionary and a dictionary of the English language are absolutely essential, as in the framing of statutes the use of the right word in the right place and the use of the exact word to express the meaning intended is of great consequence.

The expense of obtaining all these books will not probably exceed $300.

The Clerk read the resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Documents be requested to furnish the House of Representatives, for the use of the House library, 60 copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States (second edition, 1878), and also 52 copies of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States (volume 1, second edition, 1874 to 1891), two of which supplements shall be for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary the indexed Digest of United States Reports, in three volumes, published by The Lawyers' Cooperative Publishing Company, volumes 57 to 59, inclusive, of the Federal Reporter, one copy of Standard Unabridged Dictionary, Bouvier's Law Dictionary, last edition, and American and English Encyclopedia of Law, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I have never known a resolution like this to be adopted by the House of Representatives. I was not aware that it was going to be introduced. I do not know that the members of the minority of the Judiciary Committee have passed upon it specially, but I see the famous watchdog of the Treasury is on the floor—

Mr. RAY of New York. I can not hear what the gentleman is saying. I ask for order.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken. The House will be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that it is a very unusual resolution. I have never known a committee to come here and ask for spelling books. They call this a dictionary, but it seems to me it is a spelling book. But I am not going to object to it if the committee want these books, and besides, as I stated, I see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] here; and if he does not object to spending the people's money in this way, to supply the committee with books, I shall not object to it. But I want to call attention to it and to state that it is the first time I have ever known a committee of the House to be supplied with books of the kind called for in this resolution. I do not know where it will stop if we are going to commence buying law dictionaries, Bouvier's Law Dictionary, the reports of the decisions of different courts, and a Standard Dictionary for the committee.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is going very far, but I see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is in his seat, and I will leave the expenditure to him if he desires to let it pass.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman, that ordinarily when a committee desires some book incurring only a small expenditure of $8 or $10, the Clerk of the House or the Chief Clerk is called upon to supply the book. Now, this resolution calls, first, for 50 copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States and 50 copies of the Supplement for the House library. The Revised Statutes and the Supplement are printed and published by the Government, and a large number of copies are now on hand. In 1886 a resolution was adopted by this House providing a hundred copies for the House library, and since that time no similar resolution has been introduced, for the reason that no such resolution has been necessary.

Now, those copies then furnished, or most of them, have become scattered; they have disappeared; and the librarian of the House finds himself unable to supply the demands of the members of the House made from time to time; and he has therefore requested that this demand be made upon the Superintendent of Documents, who can supply these volumes without expense to the Government. This is simply a transfer from one department to another. The books are needed, and the members of the House generally understand that. Now, so far as the other books are concerned, the Committee on the Judiciary are unanimous in asking for them. Of course such a resolution comes in very rarely. We have in the committee room the first 57 volumes of the Federal Reporter. There are 97 volumes.

The Committee on the Judiciary has occasion to refer to those books almost every day, and it is indispensable that we have them. While we were asking for these books we thought it well enough to ask for a law dictionary and a dictionary of the English language. Perhaps my friend from Tennessee never needs a dictionary of any kind, but the members of the Committee on the Judiciary do. They deem it advisable, at least, and I trust no objection will be made. The expense is very small, and we are all united in asking for these books.

Mr. DALZELL. How much will they cost?

Mr. RAY of New York. About $300.

Mr. BARTLETT. I could not hear the reading of the resolution thoroughly, and I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, in the first place, how much this is going to cost?

Mr. RAY of New York. Not to exceed $300, probably; we can not tell to a dollar.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do you have to buy the Federal Reporter? How many sets of this do you have to buy?

Mr. RAY of New York. The resolution only proposes to purchase part of one set. We already have the first 57 volumes. We need the balance of the set, 40 additional volumes of the Reporter.

Mr. BARTLETT. Are there not copies of all those in the Law Library in the building?

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I hope we will have order; I can hardly hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that—perhaps as a time saver, glancing at it casually and other people appealing to me to offer amendments that these various encyclopedias and digests ought to be supplemented for this and that committee—I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but think it ought to go to the Committee on Accounts, which has jurisdiction of all expenditures out of the contingent fund.

OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota submits the following privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 77.

Whereas there was manufactured in the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, 83,141,081 pounds, or 41,750 tons, of oleomargarine, being an increase in production over the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, of 25,634,445 pounds; and

Whereas the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, colored as butter, is prohibited by law in thirty-three States of the Union: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the House of Representatives information as to the particular States in which said oleomargarine is shipped and distributed by the producers, the amount in pounds shipped or distributed in each State, and also the number of licenses issued to persons in the several States for the manufacture and sale, either by wholesale or retail, of oleomargarine, stating the number of such licenses issued to persons in each State.

The report (by Mr. TAWNEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred resolution No. 77, reports the same back to the House with the following amendments:

First. Amend by striking out the preamble.

Second. Amend by striking out the word "said," in line 3.

And, as amended, recommend that the resolution do pass.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the resolution read as it will be when amended.

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been read as it will be when amended.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. There was so much confusion in the House that we could not hear on this side.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read again as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read the resolution again.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, is this a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution of inquiry, as the Chair understands.

Mr. BAILEY of Texas. Introduced and referred to the committee and a report by the committee?

The SPEAKER. Within the six-day rule.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment to the preamble will be agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is no preamble; the preamble was stricken out. That was one of the committee amendments, striking out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. That was one of the amendments, but the amendments to the resolution must be agreed to before the amendment to the preamble.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the proposition submitted by the Chair was to agree to the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the preamble. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The hour fixed for eulogies on the death of the late Mr. GREENE, of Nebraska, was set for 1 o'clock. Without objection, this proceeding will now be taken up and considered by the House. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 1 o'clock, the hour originally fixed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 1 o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

At the request of Mr. BALL, leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of William W. Armstrong in the Fifty-fifth Congress was granted, no adverse report having been made thereon.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE-ELECT W. L. GREENE.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the special order having arrived, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER].

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions and ask their adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, late a Representative from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the House be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute of regard to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the House, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, do adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, on the 11th day of March, 1899, at 8 o'clock p. m., Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, a member of the Fifty-fifth Congress and a member-elect to the Fifty-sixth Congress, and representing the Sixth Congressional district in the State of Nebraska, came to a sudden and unexpected death in my home city of Omaha. Only a few days before the date mentioned he was with us in this Chamber, full of life and hope, and without a sign of ailment or disease. He was daily in attendance upon the sessions of the House, active in his Department work, and watchful of the interests of his constituents here and elsewhere. He gave close attention to all proceedings in this body and made his presence felt in many debates. The closing hours of the Fifty-fifth Congress were most tedious, and we were kept in session until late in the morning, yet Mr. GREENE never rested from his labors and was on duty when that Congress adjourned sine die. He seemed in the best of health and full of good humor. During a lull in the proceedings, while awaiting a conference report, he and I had our last exchange of greetings. Notwithstanding we belonged to different political organizations and more than once clashed our blades over a difference in opinion, we separated at the close of the Fifty-fifth Congress good friends and little dreaming that that separation was to be our last.

The following extract, taken from the Omaha Bee of date March 12, 1899, fully explains the manner of his death:

At 7 o'clock last night WILLIAM L. GREENE, of Kearney, of the Sixth Congressional district of Nebraska, was apparently hale, hearty, and in the full enjoyment of life, with all its pleasures, domestic, social, and political. At 8 o'clock he had joined the great majority, and the awful majesty of death was stamped upon his face as he lay in his last sleep on the cold mosaic floor of the Burlington station in this city.

Mr. GREENE came to Omaha from Lincoln on Friday evening and put up at the Arcade Hotel. He had been at the State capital for some days, having come up from Washington to witness the election of a Nebraska Senator. After spending Saturday greeting his friends and attending to business in town he took a hack about 7.45 in the evening to catch the Burlington train to Lincoln.

Congressman GREENE was accompanied by three friends, bound for the same train, J. C. Reeves, of Madison County, a farmer; F. B. Prince, a hotel keeper of Madison, and T. B. Donovan, of the Madison Star.

On reaching the station Congressman GREENE was observed lying back in the seat of the hack as if asleep, and every effort was made by his companions and the passenger director to arouse him. He was borne in an unconscious state to the waiting room of the depot, and in answer to a telephone message Dr. S. H. Smith was soon in attendance. On looking at the body the doctor pronounced him dead and advised the railway authorities to summon the coroner. His advice was immediately followed, and in a few minutes Coroner Swanson had gathered the facts and the body was removed to the morgue. Death was attributed to heart failure.

Mr. GREENE was born October 3, 1849, and hence was not quite 50 years of age at the time of his death. He first saw the light of day upon a farm in Pike County, Ind., and his father being a farmer he followed that vocation until he acquired a sufficient education to teach school. During his farm life he attended the district school in winter until he was competent to enter the academy at Ireland, Ind., an institution he attended for three years. While serving as school-teacher he employed his spare time to such an advantage that in 1876 he was admitted to the bar in Bloomington, Ind., and soon thereafter he was in full practice of his new profession.

Mr. GREENE was an ambitious young man, and not making the headway in his law practice that he desired, he decided to move west and reap some of the harvest falling to the lot of others who had preceded him to that great empire beyond the Mississippi. After some correspondence with friends in Nebraska, he decided that Kearney, Nebr., a rapidly growing town about 200 miles west of Omaha, would meet his expectations, and thither he and family went in 1883. By close application to his profession he soon became recognized as an able exponent of the law and his rank at the bar, especially in criminal practice, was high. He was a Democrat in politics, but gave very little attention thereto until the Populist party effected an organization in our State. Of this party organization he was a charter member and achieved so much distinction in it that during the winter of 1892-93 he came within a few votes of being elected United States Senator, the prize finally going to Hon. WILLIAM V. ALLEN, after a spirited contest.

In 1895 Mr. GREENE was elected judge of the Twelfth judicial district of Nebraska, which position he resigned to enter Congress.

Mr. GREENE at the age of 23 years wedded Miss Emma Dowell, at Shoals, Ind., and his widow and seven children survive him.

I will leave to those of my colleagues who were intimately and personally associated with Judge GREENE the privilege of reciting at length his life and character, for my acquaintance with him was limited and confined principally to our association as members of the Fifty-fifth Congress. I first met him in Kearney, Nebr., when he was serving as district judge, and I found him then not only kind and courteous to members of the bar and litigants generally, but I also found him to be very popular with the masses. As an advocate, he was unusually strong before a jury, and as a campaign orator he was without many equals in our State, while as a judge he had the confidence both of the people and the bar.

When he came to Congress he proved himself dangerous in debate, for he was not only forceful in manner but ingenious in his argument. He was full of confidence in himself and never appeared ill at ease in addressing the House. He loved discussion, and took part in the running debates at every opportunity. His tongue was full of words and it tossed them right and left at the slightest provocation. These words were not always gentle; on the contrary, more than once they seemed to have been dipped in vitriol, and in consequence during one term in Congress he became involved in most serious contentions, but his big heart soon prompted him to forgive and forget.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of sorrow and of loss that we meet here to-day to talk of the life and services of our friend and colleague, WILLIAM L. GREENE. He was a man splendidly endowed and superbly equipped by the Creator for the struggle of life. A strong man physically and mentally, he was ready to meet any emergency and enter any conflict. For more than twenty-five years he was in the public view, either holding positions of trust and honor or on the platform, battling for principles and truths as he understood them. Absolutely fearless in standing for what he believed to be right, he possessed none of those hesitations and doubts that less ably equipped mortals have in enunciating and defending well-matured convictions on public questions.

For years prior to his election to Congress he was a leading character in the political history of our State. During the early alliance days and in the organization of the reform movement he was a power. Gifted with all the attributes of the orator and with a singular power over the minds of men, his services were in great demand. In the Senatorial contest of 1893 he was a leading candidate for that high office, and for many ballots by the legislature he came within two votes of the election, but, voluntarily withdrawing, he threw his influence in favor of the one of his choice, who was elected.

In 1895 he was elected judge of the Twelfth judicial district of Nebraska, holding that important office until his election to Congress. The lawyers and litigants of the district were unanimous in his praise as one of the best and fairest judges that ever presided over the court of that district. He dearly loved a debate on the questions of the day, and to him it was happiness in the extreme when some one crossed swords with him. His devotion to his family and the manner in which his children at home crowded around him and took possession of him but indicated the tenderness of the parent and the reciprocal love of the child.

In his platform work his style was felicitous. How often have I heard him tell a story that clearly illustrated a point, with a humor that was irresistible, and then almost instantly the whole question would be reviewed with a pathos that would touch the roughest heart. But death is an inexorable tyrant. He comes at his own appointed time, whether we are ready to greet him or not. He says to the mother that her little babe must go, and although the mother's heart breaks with sorrow, the flower that is the joy of her life is transplanted to bloom in fairer fields. He casts his dart at the strong young man, just ready for life and its opportunities, and although his plans and those of his friends comprehend magnificent conquests, yet in sight of them all he falls. He came to my friend and colleague, strong in his power and manhood, in the midst of his work that a great people had commissioned him to perform, and with a sigh he joined the ever-increasing multitude that are passing over to the other side. The old man whose hair is whiter than snow and whose heart has sung nothing but psalms his whole life long gladly meets the king of terrors and lies down to sweet slumber. It is one deep mystery and unsolved problem to us all. The veil that separates us from the knowledge of the unseen is thin, but it can not be penetrated. The longing for immortality has possessed every heart from Plato's age to our own. In good time it will be made clear to each of us. My hope is that when we come to lay down our burdens and to render unto nature the things that are due her, that we may leave behind us as many loving hearts and true friends as did WILLIAM L. GREENE.

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, so far as we have any knowledge man, is the only one of all created beings to whom is given the information that all earthly life must end in death. The experience and observation of mankind early in life impresses upon his mind the fact that death is the common lot of all the race. Through the grim gateway whose gloomy portals open upon a mystery which the yearning eyes of humanity have never penetrated or solved all created beings which from the beginning have trod the earth in life have passed, and through that same gateway all created beings now living or hereafter to be born must surely go. This much we know to be the plan of the great Creator of the universe. The gift of earthly life brings with it the certainty of earthly death.

The promised length of days to man is three score years and ten, but certain as is death, it seems to enter but little into the plans and calculations of our life. There is within us a feeling which causes us to look with terror and aversion upon death. We shrink from contemplation of the awful mystery. So common and universal to mankind is this feeling that many join in the belief that it is part of nature's plan to guard the race in times of trial, misfortune, misery, and despair from seeking entrance through the gates of death before, in the fullness of nature's plans, they are called to go. In vain has humanity, during all the centuries, rapped at the dark and silent portals through which the countless millions have passed. The yearning desire of all mankind to know what lies beyond the tomb is only satisfied by faith as it is manifest in some of the established forms of religion upon earth.

As in the course of life youth, strength, and vigor must pass from us with the lapse of years, to give way to the feebleness and helplessness of age, it would seem to be a part of nature's plan to prepare the human mind to enter into the dread "valley of the shadow of death" with resignation. But death does not always wait until the tree of life is withered, nor does it always give warning of its approach by robbing the vigorous limbs of their strength, by whitening the locks, by dimming the brightness of the eye, or causing the elastic step to become feeble and wavering. It comes at times without warning to robust youth and vigorous manhood; and so the message came to him whose untimely death we this day commemorate. When to the human eye he seemed in the full vigor of health, when, judging by his years, he was in the very prime of manhood, death placed its finger upon his heart and it was still.

In speaking of the brother who has gone I leave to others who were acquainted with his work on this floor and who knew him intimately as a friend the task of telling in detail of his life. I had no personal acquaintance with the deceased in life, and only knew him as he was known by thousands of the people of our State. He was a man who possessed to a remarkable degree the gift of oratory, but he only used that great gift in advocating that which he believed to be right.

His early life was spent upon a Western farm; he knew the hardships and trials of the early pioneer, and his first toil was performed in reclaiming land from the wild state of nature and in sowing the seed and gathering the harvest. His sympathies were always with the masses of mankind.

He was one of the founders of the People's Independent Party and was one of the strongest advocates and staunchest defenders of its principles.

He was repeatedly honored by the people of our State. In 1895 he was elected to the office of district judge and brought to the discharge of the duties of that high office a mind ripened by years of training and study in the active practice of the law. He was called from that position by the people of his district to represent them in the Fifty-fifth Congress and was reelected to the present Congress.

His work in life is done; he rests in eternal sleep, surrounded by the broad prairies of the State he loved, where the winds in summer kiss the fields of ripening grain, loved and remembered by the thousands who listened to his voice in life, as it pleaded for liberty, justice, equality, and right.

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a sad duty to offer words of condolence, due this House, a suffering constituency, and bereaved family, by reason of the death of one so beloved by all.

While your acquaintance with Judge GREENE was the result of necessary business contact, and your opinion of him formed, no doubt, first, from a social chat in the cloakroom, and afterwards modified or wholly changed by heated political discussion in this Hall, yet you were not in position to fully understand the greatness of our deceased brother.

I knew Judge GREENE personally well from the time of his advent in Nebraska, seventeen years ago, until the day of his death, and during that period had the good fortune to be associated with him many times in the political field, quite frequently in the trial of causes before the courts, and for some years upon the bench.

His characteristics were most agreeable to those who knew him best.

His mind was a great deal stronger than his body, and his soul immensely greater than his pocketbook.

He was always in sympathetic touch with the environments of his daily walks—an ideal Populist—jocund and happy when his fellow-men were prosperous and contented, and despondent and solicitous when disaster and squalor threatened those surrounding him.

Early in life Judge GREENE attached himself to the membership of the Baptist Church and throughout was an able exponent and successful defender of the faith and creed in which he believed.

In his business associations he was always ready to assume his share of the burden, but gave little heed to the emoluments which follow business methods.

In his social relations he was an agreeable and genial companion, and in his home life he was a kind, loving, and indulgent father and devoted and affectionate husband.

Reflection only mystifies, and the field of vision and research will not reveal; yet it must be that the God of all, in the interminable conflict with Satan, needed less advocates here or a more skilled one in the perfectly developed world, where acoustic properties are unlimited and human effort becomes divine.

His death was your loss. It shattered the fond expectations of a confiding constituency and stranded upon the sandy beach of despair the hopes of a trusting but dependent family.

From a narrow-minded and selfish view his death was my gain, but with bowed head and sorrowing heart I join with you, with his constituency, and his bereaved family in casting upon his bier the green twig of regret and planting upon his fresh-made grave the constant forget-me-not.

To-day we record the grief sayings of contemporaries; to-morrow we plunge into the domain of business demands, forgetting our sorrow or the possible results from its cause. A few days hence squalor overtakes the loved but helpless ones surviving. Soon thereafter we leave the beaten path. A new generation trods by in business garb without time to turn their heads or read our record.

It is well that God takes care of those gone; we delve in our limited way for the benefit of those to come.

Business absorbs the energies of the human family. Rush is the order of the day regardless of the wake. Yet death overtakes all; a sad awakening to the heedless, but a relief to those whose charity is great without its instrument.

We say our brother is dead, yet we believe he still lives, and our belief should make us strive to do in our allotted time upon this earth as much good and as little intentional wrong.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Speaker, of the time that has been set apart for eulogy on the life and character of our late Congressman from Nebraska, the Hon. W. L. GREENE, I feel that I should occupy but a few moments. There are others who have better right to claim the time than I have.

I feel that this hour should be occupied by those who knew him personally, who were associated with him as a member of this House, and to whom that acquaintance and association had endeared him. Yet, sirs, I can not refrain from adding a few words to the many that shall be spoken kindly and tenderly of him to-day. I regret that it was not my privilege and honor to know him personally. We were citizens of the same State; our homes were separated only by a few level miles of beautiful Nebraskan prairies; yet for some unaccountable reason an opportunity never presented itself for us to become acquainted. I knew his associates and acquaintances in great numbers; many of his friends were and are my friends; hence I do feel that in a measure and in a sense I did know him.

I knew him as an active, prominent citizen of our State; I knew him as a tender-hearted father and a good neighbor; I knew him as a man ever ready to sacrifice his personal welfare that others might be comforted; I knew him as a big-hearted, generous, and charitable man.

Few men of our State were better known among us than was Judge GREENE. He held important official positions and took an active part in the affairs of our Commonwealth. I presume that few names were more familiar to the people than was the name of our late Congressman from the Sixth district. He was prominent in politics long before he came to Congress. His coming here was the reward for faithful service to his party and loyalty and devotion to the rights and needs of his people. He was an unusual man in many particulars. I am told by those who knew him that he had a faculty of making very warm friends and that, as is usual with such natures, he did not have many bitter enemies. His friends loved him and followed him and supported him with a true devotion.

He was a brilliant campaigner. His reputation as an orator was indeed an enviable one, if such a selfish expression were permissible. Few men had the readiness of speech that he had, and still fewer possessed, combined with that readiness, the wit and eloquence with which he was gifted.

His presence on the platform was attractive, his nature was magnetic, and he was always able to hold the closest attention of his hearers.

He had a faculty of using the simplest and oftentimes the most ridiculous objects as illustrations with persuasive effect. I remember once of hearing a man telling of a speech that he had heard Mr. GREENE deliver somewhere the night before and he had taken for his theme, or rather object lesson, a brass button that he had happened to find as he came to the place of meeting. With that insignificant object as a subject, he made his address. With it he made fun and pathos, and from it he proceeded to discuss both the coinage and the tariff questions. Whatever else may be said of him, he possessed rare genius as an orator.

It was not my good fortune, as it was permitted many of you here to-day, to sit in Congress with him. I know very little of his work here in this body. But that he performed the duties of his office to the satisfaction of the majority of his constituents at least was told by his reelection to a seat in this Congress, which he was prevented from taking only by death.

It was my sad duty to attend his funeral services. Of the things that most impressed me upon that occasion was the great multitude of people that had gathered there to help consign his remains to the tomb.

It was a raw, wintry March day. It rained and sleeted and snowed, but breasting all the elements, they came from far and near, from all that country, to pay their last tribute of love and respect for their departed friend and public servant.

It only demonstrated that the people loved him. It was an inaudible eulogy to his manhood and spoke clearer than a clarion that he had been a good citizen at home, a good member of the community in which he lived, and that he had endeared himself to the hearts of his fellow-men.

This, to my mind, is the highest tribute that can be paid to any man, that he was loved by his fellows.

If there was one sentiment more often than all others voiced there upon that occasion, it was the humanitarian principle and practice of Judge GREENE. All said that he was generous even to his own detriment; that he was charitable beyond measure; that in his heart there abounded fraternity, and that he loved his fellow-men and was willing to sacrifice his personal comfort and welfare that others might be more happy. And as we stood there by his open grave, surrounded by those friends from far and near, from all walks and callings and avocations in life, the raw wind driving the sleet and snow into our very marrow, I could not help but think of that story of George Howe, in that beautiful little compilation of tales of Auld Druntochty—Bonnie Brier Bush.

That story impresses the fact, as you remember, that to be great in death one must have merited it in life—that men are loved for what they do for others, rather than what they do for themselves. You remember George Howe sacrificed his comfort and personal tastes for poor, miserable, drunken, gutter-bedragged Andra Chambers. He curbed his vanity and gave others credit for his own efforts, and "made them better than himself," as one of the characters says. But in turn all loved him, and at his death they gathered together from all classes to lay him away. The rich boy from the city was there, and the fisherman's son from the seashore.

Royal blood coursed through the veins of the one, and tracing his ancestry to the "beautiful queen," he gloried in a noble pedigree. The other could see naught behind him but a stern manipulator of a fishing smack. With them, too, you remember, was poor downfallen Chambers. Truly it was a cosmopolitan gathering. They blended their tears and shared their sorrows—the rich and the poor, the high and the low, nobility and peasant. For each and all he had done something.

Our beloved Congressman is gone. He lives now only by his example. His deeds are history. From them may we cull the good and emulate them, and thus build for ourselves lasting tablets in the memories of our fellow-men.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I had not thought to say anything on this occasion, and only do so now from the fact that it was my good fortune to know Judge GREENE when he and I were in our young manhood. More than twenty years ago in Indiana he was the pastor of the Baptist church in the neighboring town of Ellettsville. Although a young man, his eloquence was known far beyond the town in which he was the pastor. In his young days, as demonstrated here in his latter days, he was aggressive—not only aggressive, but was always ready to stand by the firm convictions he had.

A controversy arose between Mr. GREENE and Elder W. B. F. Treat, of the Christian persuasion, and a little later a joint discussion was arranged. Nearly everybody said that the young Baptist had made a mistake; that he would hardly be able to cope with the elder, who was fifteen years his senior, and had already participated in several similar debates. Gentlemen, as you who knew him on the floor of this House would expect, the debate had gone on only a day when public sentiment began to change, and at the end of the week, when the discussion closed, everybody sang the praises of the young Baptist, and many of his friends claimed that he had won the debate from the elder. Certainly he conducted the discussion in such a vigorous and aggressive manner that he won a reputation as a debater throughout the State of Indiana.

I only speak of this, gentlemen, for the purpose of exhibiting in its true light the real merit of our distinguished friend who has gone hence. Not only did he make his convictions manifest in that way, but he always loved a war of words. It was the ambition of his youth to become a lawyer. Shortly, he determined to abandon the profession of the ministry, having read law during the entire time of his preaching; he was admitted to the bar at Bloomington, of which I had the distinction at that time of being a member. Although he may have been considered somewhat lacking in early training, it was only a short time before he had a clientele that was not only lucrative, but one which any of the older members of that bar might have envied. All knew that he was painstaking—always faithful to the interests of his clients; and the lawyer who had "WILLIAM L. GREENE," as he was generally called, as an adversary, knew that there was before him a battle royal until every point in the case had been fully contested and settled one way or the other.

In the course of about three years he made a remarkable reputation as a preacher, and in less time as an attorney—coextensive not simply with his county, but with the entire section of the State. He went West, and he had been there but a little time when the people of his adopted State recognized his magnificent ability, his impressive oratory, and his strength before a jury. They recognized also that he had a judicial mind; and in view of this he was elected to the responsible position of judge of the district in which he resided. I am told by his friends that on the bench he acquitted himself with great ability and credit.

It was my good fortune to meet him next at the beginning of the Fifty-fifth Congress; and to you who are here I can say, without speaking disparagingly of other members of that or preceding Congresses, that I question whether any gentleman has made here a stronger, a more deserved, a better reputation as a debater and for fidelity to the principles which he came here to advocate.

Always present, ever ready not only to combat the opposition of those with whom he disagreed, but ready to advocate and maintain the position that he might take in opposition, ready in debate, quick of perception, strong and forceful in speech, true not only to the principles of the platform on which he was elected, but true to the citizenship of his State, and, above all, his principles were always American.

And who of us, gentlemen, could leave behind us a greater or a better name, a more honorable heritage, than Mr. GREENE left as a father true, honest, and faithful, a husband loyal and loving, a preacher in the fullest sense, a lawyer in its broadest meaning, and, above all, a statesman able to take rank as a peer with the best men of his age?

Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM L. GREENE has gone to that bourne whence no traveler returns; but his spirit, his strong manhood, his fidelity to principle and to the fundamental doctrines of the Republic remain; and they may well be emulated by any one of the members of the Fifty-sixth Congress and others who may follow him on the floor of this House.

[Mr. RICHARDSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the deceased, WILLIAM L. GREENE, though he was in this body but a few months, left a void most difficult to fill.

He was congenial, approachable, evenly tempered, very resourceful, and a lovable companion.

His avenues of learning were vast and extensive. He had a great familiarity with the best current literature; was thoroughly familiar with the most advanced thought in political economy and the science of government, and possessed a most versatile and happy faculty for making application of his knowledge.

Nature, in making its wise division of labor by giving different men aptitudes for different callings, was certainly very liberal in blessing him with unusual powers of eloquence and with great facilities as a debater.

He had inherited a great memory that enabled him to easily store the choicest metaphors and allegories in literature for use at a moment's notice.

He was industrious and, while not ambitious or egotistical, yearned for a contest in the arena of debate. This was not for vainglory or spectacular display of his superb powers, but rather because he had well-settled convictions and desired to expose what he considered the errors of his adversaries, so that those who ran might read, and at the same time to convince them of what he considered as the inherent logic and eternal justice involved in his convictions.

He, like others so gifted, was conscious of his great equipment for debate and was also conscious that he, belonging to a minority party and having to occupy a position on insignificant committees and having no great newspapers back of him, had to force his way by the sheer power of aptly pointing out the merit of his own cause and the clean exposition of the demerits in that of his antagonists.

But few probably have ever appeared in these halls under so many discouraging environments who have risen higher above them in so short a time. He was not extreme in anything, indulged in no intemperance of language or sallies of passion, confining himself at all times to the most becoming amenities of debate.

He, like many other men so gifted, overworked the brain at times and was compelled to disengage his faculties from the direction in which they had been too long bent. It was most unfortunate that his party and his country had to lose one so equipped for good in the very noontime of his allotted three score and ten years, but such is the inexorable law of nature that whenever man overdraws her resources for any considerable length of time, the penalty is demanded.

It is with much sadness and regret that we are called upon by this unfortunate event to pay this last tribute to his merit, but he will always be remembered in his State, in his party, and among his friends as a great combination of good fellowship, great intellectual resources, and possessed of the highest aspirations for the complete brotherhood of man and for a government whose benefits and burdens, like the air of heaven, shall ever bear equally upon every individual.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, these memorial occasions, of which there were many during the Fifty-fifth Congress and will be many more during this, impress the fact upon our minds that "in the midst of life we are in death."

We are forcibly struck with the truth of this declaration as we remember how unexpectedly the last summons came to our friend and colleague.

When I bade him good-bye at the close of the last session, he was, to me, the picture of health; and when the papers gave the shocking intelligence that he had fallen before the last enemy a few days after reaching his home, I remarked to friends that he was one of the members of Congress who promised to live his three score and ten.

I must leave to those nearer to him an outline of his life, while I speak briefly of his public character and the impressions he made on me.

Nature seemed to have endowed him with a strong character and fixed purposes, and great zeal and earnestness in the discharge of his duty.

These qualities, together with his experience at the bar and on the bench, rendered him an active and useful member of this House. Very few men during their first term have taken a more active part in the debates than did Judge GREENE, and a stranger listening would have taken him for one of the older members, so perfectly at home did he appear and so free from self-consciousness. His uniform courtesy and frankness impressed me, and it gave me pleasure on more than one occasion to congratulate him on his efforts or express admiration at his forbearance. I am glad to be able to say this in all sincerity, for we too often wait until our friends are dead to speak words of praise. It is well to strew flowers on their graves, but better to cheer their lives with well-chosen words of commendation whenever they are deserved.

I was struck with his earnest and well-defined patriotism, his love for his State and country.

This was evident to all who heard his speech April 12, 1898, on Cuban independence. As I listened to that speech, I thought of what Patrick Henry said in the Virginia convention in September, 1774:

I am not a Virginian, but an American.

The speech of Judge GREENE breathed a spirit of fervor and consecrated love of country that we witness so often in the lives of men who come from the broad plains and fertile fields of our splendid Western Commonwealths.

We count on the sterling character of their Representatives, backed by a noble body of yeomanry behind them, to help steer our ship of state through the perilous voyage on which we are embarked in this transition period.

In the speech referred to Judge GREENE gave utterance to these words:

We have reached a point where partisanship should be forgotten. But while devoted to the principles of the party to which I belong, I am first and above all an American citizen, and I seek first the welfare and glory of my country; I seek the honor of my country, and whatever makes for its peace and permanent prosperity I welcome, whether it come from this or that or the other section of this Chamber or any one of the political organizations into which it is divided.

These occasions remind us that "it is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die."

What we call death, with all its painful apprehensions and anxious forebodings, is but a change of form and duration of existence. Religion, nature, conscience—all teach that there is a life beyond. When the frail casket that holds our better and nobler being is laid in the silent grave, the emancipated spirit will return to the Being who gave it, and we shall find homes prepared that the "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither entered into the heart of man."

Though cut off in the prime of life, in the midst of an honorable and useful career, our colleague did not live in vain. His influences will survive in his country, his State, and on the pages of his country's history.

We do not agree with the couplet—

The evil that men do lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones—

But prefer to believe that the evil that men do is a signal light to warn their fellows of the breakers ahead, while the good is a friendly signboard to point the road to higher endeavor and nobler purpose.

May these occasions, hallowed in their tendencies and time-honored as a custom, bring pure and noble thoughts to our minds as we pay tributes of respect to our departed friends. In emulating the virtues and shunning the weaknesses—if he had them—of our lamented friend, let us so live as to bring credit to ourselves and advance the interests and promote the happiness and well-being of those who have clothed us with the grave responsibilities of official position.

With tender memories of our departed colleague we pray that peace and happiness may follow those who immediately and directly bind that memory to earth.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to go into a history of the life and career of Judge GREENE, our deceased colleague. That history has been already well and faithfully given by his colleagues on this floor from the State of Nebraska and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS]. They have told us how Judge GREENE began the struggle of life in Indiana, how he went to the great West and settled in the State of Nebraska, which he loved so well, and there began the practice of his profession of the law; how he was elevated to the bench and finally elected to Congress. I rise as one who never knew Judge GREENE until the beginning of the Fifty-fifth Congress to bear my testimony to his worth and character. I can speak with knowledge of his ability, disposition, and temperament, as I have often seen him tried on this floor.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it is fitting when a gentleman who has been honored by a great people departs this life in the service of his country that his colleagues should pause for a while in their ordinary legislative duties for the purpose of paying a tribute of respect to his memory. We have many occasions of this character.

Since the election of 1898 seven members elected to this body have died. Mr. Dingley, of Maine; Mr. GREENE, of Nebraska; Mr. Baird, of Louisiana; Mr. Bland, of Missouri; Mr. Danford, of Ohio; Mr. Ermentrout, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Settle, of Kentucky; and I might add that the recently elected Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Hayward, is dead, as well as the Vice-President of the United States, Mr. Hobart, eulogies upon whose services and character are to-day being delivered by Senators in the other end of this Capitol.

When an old man dies the span of whose life has been finished, whose work is done, we say it is a pity; we recognize that it is a cause of sorrow, although we know that it is in the course of nature and that such must be the case. Death must come to the old. But when a young man, or a man in the prime of life, with his great life work still before him, with the burden still on his shoulders, dies, either by accident or suddenly, we are more than ever reminded that life on this earth does not and can not last always, and that humanity is mortal. Such was the death of WILLIAM L. GREENE. In March last we shook hands with him, then strong, joyful, confident, apparently well, framed to reach three-score years and ten. A few days thereafter over the wires came the news of his sudden death.

I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, the first impression that Judge GREENE made upon me and, I think, upon the House.

It was in the beginning of the first or extra session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. Many here now will remember how, at one of the night sessions in the early part of that Congress, he made a most vigorous and effective speech during the pendency of the tariff bill then before us; and we remember how, during the course of that speech, many of the members on the floor who had not known Judge GREENE took out their Directory and consulted it to find out something about him, and asked each other, "Who is that man?" He was a man of large form, about 5 feet 10 inches high and weighing about 200 pounds, broad shouldered, wide in forehead, with a heavy suit of waving dark-brown hair, and piercing eyes. He indicated by his very presence extreme vigor and physical strength, and his argument was evidence of a strong intellect. As we heard that speech and saw in the Directory that he was a lawyer, we could well imagine his great influence and strength before a court and jury. I think I can safely say that he never made a speech on the floor of this House without adding information to the subject on which he was talking and without giving strength to the position he advocated.

I do not know that I ought to refer to personal matters or to matters that partake of a personal character in this connection, but we remember that he and his distinguished colleague from the Second district of Nebraska had an earnest and somewhat personal controversy on the floor of this House. It was a controversy in which both gentlemen displayed unusual resource, strength, knowledge, and ability, and out of which both came with respect for his adversary—both parties receiving from and yielding to the other respect. And we remember, Mr. Speaker—and I thought it the most striking part of that discussion—the courteous spirit of magnanimity and kindness of heart with which Judge GREENE met the conclusion of the colloquy.

He impressed me as being a man of a clear intellect, a candid heart, and a truthful tongue; as a searcher for the truth in every controversy in which he was engaged, and a man whose influence must have increased had he lived to bear the part that he seemed then destined to bear in the deliberations of this House. Clearness, strength, readiness, and kindness were striking traits of his character.

We easily believe him to have been a speaker of the first rank on the stump, and the great principles to which he dedicated his best manhood lost one of their ablest and most effective champions in his death. May the eulogies to-day delivered be a consolation to his friends who shared with him in political sentiment and with whom he labored till the close of his earthly career.

Genial, candid, generous, he realized that life was toil and duty, not a trifle or a plaything, and to perform the toil and duty of living he consecrated a great mind, a great heart, and a strong body. The recollection of his virtues and powers will ever be a pleasure to his friends, while the Christian life and death he had will be a sweet consolation to all who knew him, and especially to his loving kindred. After all, to die a Christian's death should be the great purpose of every man. Honors and riches and all else desired by mortal man shall perish away with generations and be forgotten amid the centuries, but the soul that has put its trust in the Conqueror of death, the Redeemer of the world, shall live forever. Wherever human intellect has existed there has been an earnest desire, a silent prayer, for immortality—for an eternity of existence.

The kindness and mercy of an all-wise Creator has answered that universal prayer, and so to-day, in accordance with the blessed doctrines of the New Testament and his faith in them, we believe that the spirit of Judge GREENE is destined to eternal happiness. As we have by his death been reminded that Father Time is ever ready with his scythe to strike us down, let us take the solemn lesson ever impressed upon us and renew our devotion to the best principles of every great and worthy existence, right and justice to all and by all, strict performance of duty amid all temptations, and never-failing kindness and charity to all of God's creatures. Then may we, Mr. Speaker, when the dread summons calls us from loved ones into unknown darkness, go not alone—terrible thought, alone—but be, as we believe Judge GREENE was, accompanied by the Prince of Peace, whose mercy, love, and sacrifice is sufficient for us and shall ever bless us.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, Representative STARK, of our State, is unavoidably absent because of the death of his father. It was his intention to address the House to-day, during these proceedings, in commemoration of our deceased colleague. I ask unanimous consent that he, and other gentlemen who desire to do so, may be permitted to print remarks in the RECORD in this connection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that consent will be given. There was no objection.

Mr. MERCER. I now ask the announcement of the result of the vote on the pending resolutions.

Mr. CLAY. I present a resolution adopted by the general assembly of the State of Georgia, favoring the enactment of legislation to enable C. P. Goodyear to continue his work upon the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., by the use of dynamite and auxiliary methods. The resolution was unanimously adopted by the legislature of my State, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

A RESOLUTION.

Whereas the general assembly of the State of Georgia of 1893 by joint resolution urged that the Senators and Representatives from Georgia in the Congress of the United States be requested to urge upon Congress the passage of legislation which would enable C. P. Goodyear to continue his work upon the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., by the use of dynamite and auxiliary methods; and

Whereas such legislation was procured from Congress and C. P. Goodyear has patriotically continued this great public work at great sacrifice to himself and has procured a channel through the ocean bar of Brunswick, Ga., over 25 feet in depth and over 150 feet in width, and 24 feet in depth over 20 feet in width at the narrowest point in said channel to the ocean, as contrasted with 18 feet at the period when he commenced work upon the said bar, a gain in depth of 7 feet and over in a new and independent channel to the sea, far less difficult of navigation than the old channel, and through which the largest vessels now constructed can pass with ease, such channel width being in excess of the contract of C. P. Goodyear with the Government, of both the 24 and 25 foot depth, of 50 feet in the narrowest point of said channel; and

Whereas the results have fully justified the general assembly of 1893 in its action, and it is understood that after entire payment of the contract price with the Government to C. P. Goodyear he will be largely indebted on account of said enterprise, and is willing to procure a channel of 25 feet in depth across said bar, and that he can maintain said depths at a reasonable compensation per year for a period of ten years or longer; and

Whereas the statistics of the port of Brunswick, compiled by its board of trade, show that, due to this great work, the business of the port of Brunswick has increased 400 per cent in the past five years, the largest increase in any port in the United States, to the great benefit of Georgia and the entire country:

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Georgia (the senate concurring). That the Senators and Representatives from Georgia in the Congress of the United States be requested to urge the passage of such legislation, the appropriation under Mr. Goodyear's methods being, with the exception of a compensation for an excess of width described, purely conditional upon such procurement and maintenance and at less cost than such work has ever been done in the history of harbor deepening in this and other countries.

JOHN D. LITTLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.
JOHN T. BOIFEUILLET,
Clerk House of Representatives.
WILLIAM A. DODSON,
President of Senate.

and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 2358) to amend sections 2731 and 2732 of the Revised Statutes so as to increase the salary of the assistant appraisers at San Francisco, Cal., from $2,500 a year to $3,000 a year; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2359) for the erection of a statue of Commodore John D. Sloat in the city of Monterey, Cal.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2360) for the relief of Daniel Martin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2361) to remove the charge of desertion from Thomas Colahan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2362) to amend certain sections of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the inspection of vessels; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MONEY introduced a bill (S. 2363) for the relief of James W. Person and Isabella M. Person; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 2364) for the relief of Anna F. Polk and the heirs or legal representatives of Allen J. Polk, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 2365) for the relief of the estate of John T. Callahan, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2366) to authorize the establishment, at some point on Beaufort Harbor, North Carolina, of a station for the investigation of problems connected with marine fishery interests of the middle and south Atlantic coast; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2367) granting a pension to Susan Stratton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2368) granting a pension to May A. Randall; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the bill be read at length and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill was read the second time at length and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

A bill in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That when all insurrection against the sovereignty and authority of the United States in the Philippine Islands, acquired from Spain by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898, shall have been completely suppressed by the military and naval forces of the United States, all military, civil, and judicial powers necessary to govern the said islands shall, until otherwise provided by Congress, be vested in such person and persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of said islands in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SEWELL, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying Senate bill 5360, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, to correct the military record of Thomas W. Buttle, private, Company C, Eighth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MAHON HARBOR (DELAWARE) IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. KENNEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause a survey and estimate to be made for the dredging, improving, and protection of Mahon Harbor, Delaware.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which, with the accompanying letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the last annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the use of the Bureau of Pensions.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE-ELECT GREENE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, transmitted to the Senate the resolutions of the House as a tribute to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the resolutions just received from the House be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolutions from the House of Representatives; which were read:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, late a Representative from the State of Nebraska.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the House be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute of regard to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the House, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, do adjourn.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I trust that the resolutions will take the ordinary course, and I shall call them up at some future time for the purpose of affording Senators an opportunity to deliver addresses upon the life and services of Mr. GREENE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie on the table for the present.

HUGO O. LOEWI.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible, in his opinion, with the public interests, with copies of all the correspondence which has been had relating to the claim of Hugo O. Loewi against Haiti since the response to the Senate's resolution of June 6, 1898.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the word "requested" and insert "directed."

Mr. HOAR. Before that question is put, I should like to explain to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations that I understand it never has been the custom—at any rate it has not been the general custom—to address requests of this kind to the Secretary of State. I think we always use the word "directed" in reference to a Department officer, and we never leave to him the question of expediency with reference to the public service. Requests relating to foreign relations, if I am not mistaken, are always addressed to the President.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. HOAR. And the President is requested to furnish the information if, in his judgment, it is not incompatible with the public interests.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator is entirely correct. It was a mere inadvertence. If it goes to the Secretary of State, it should be a direction.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate may have some doubt about it, the request ought to go to the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BACON. I was unable to hear the colloquy between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Minnesota, but unless the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts covers the point, I suggest that the resolution ought to be further amended by striking out the words "if not incompatible, in his opinion, with the public interests." Those words are included in the resolution, and they ought to be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. My suggestion was that if it were a matter pertaining to the foreign relations of the country, as to the publicity of which there was any doubt, it ought to go to the President and be referred to his discretion; but if there was no doubt in the Senate as to the propriety of the matter being disclosed, then it should go to the Secretary of State with a direction without any reference to his discretion; and in this view I understood the Senator from Minnesota to concur.

Mr. BACON. Then I understand the Senator from Minnesota also agrees to striking out the words "if not incompatible, in his opinion, with the public interests." It is directed to the Secretary of State and not the President.

Mr. DAVIS. This is a mere matter of the claim of a private citizen against Haiti. This request is for the continuation of the information heretofore furnished. It does not belong at all to the discretion of the Secretary of State. It was through an inadvertence that that phrase was used. The words "if not incompatible, in his opinion, with the public interests" have no place in a resolution of this character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks for the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Minnesota to modify his resolution?

Mr. DAVIS. I modify the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is modified by changing the word "requested" to "directed."

Mr. CHANDLER. And by striking out the clause "if not incompatible, in his opinion, with the public interests."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let it be reported to the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with copies of all the correspondence which has been had relating to the claim of Hugo O. Loewi against Haiti since the response to the Senate's resolution of June 6, 1898.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems to be perfectly obvious, as stated by the Senator from Minnesota, that this is information which would without any question be accorded by the Secretary of State; but I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he remembers an instance where the Senate has directed the Secretary of State to furnish information?

Mr. TELLER. In many cases.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not remember one instance.

Mr. DAVIS. According to my present recollection, it is not at all infrequent in cases of this character.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to state to the Senator from Wisconsin that if he will look up the authorities, he will find that we have frequently done that. To withhold information is a right which the Secretary of State or any other officer has, if he thinks it is incompatible with the public interest. That is a sufficient excuse, as far as we are concerned, as a rule. It might not be in all cases. I suppose no officer would hesitate to exercise that right. I do not think the clause needs to be put in. I think the officer has precisely the same right without the clause being in the resolution that he has when it is put in. But it has been the custom to insert it. We have always directed all of the Departments and requested the President. That is the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

INQUIRIES RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are certain resolutions coming over from a former day which, by agreement, are to be laid before the Senate to-day. The first is the resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and an amendment to the same offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether General Torres, one of the officers of the Philippine army, came to General Otis with a flag of truce on February 5, 1898, the day after the fighting commenced between our forces and those of the Philippines, and stated to General Otis that General Aguinaldo declared that fighting had begun accidentally and was not authorized by him, and that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of a width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflict between the two armies, and whether General Otis replied that fighting having once begun must go on to the grim end. Was General Otis directed by the Secretary of War to make such an answer? Did General Otis telegraph the Secretary of War on February 9, 1898, as follows: "Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference. Have declined to answer." And did General Otis afterwards reply? Was he directed by the Secretary of War to reply; and what answer, if any, did he or the Secretary of War make to the application to cease fighting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To this resolution the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] offered an amendment, which is pending, and which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting:

That the President be requested to send to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, all reports and dispatches relating to the insurrection in the Philippines, and especially any information as to communications or correspondence with the insurgents, from the 1st of January, 1898, on the part of any officer in the military, naval, consular, or diplomatic service of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offered that resolution as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota, thinking that it covered what he desired to get entirely, was in a better form, and would bring in everything relating to that subject. Subsequent to that my colleague offered a resolution which it seemed to me at first sight was unnecessary, in view of the one which I had offered, but upon examining it I came to the conclusion that his resolution, which entirely covered all that was asked for by the Senator from South Dakota, was in a better form, that it was more specific, and I have no change to suggest in the words. I think the resolution offered by my colleague will bring everything asked for either by the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota or mine. But I desire to enlarge its scope. I wish to make an addition to it. There are certain subjects for which it does not call, upon which I should like to have information, and I have no doubt other Senators would. If the Senator from South Dakota feels that his resolution is covered by the one offered by my colleague, as it seems to me it clearly is, we can withdraw ours and let that one stand with the amendment which I propose to offer to it. I want to insert, after the seventh line, on page 2, the following additional inquiries:

Also any information which may have come to him since January 1, 1898, in regard to any plans of the people in arms against the United States for the pillage of Manila, for risings in the city, or for the destruction of foreign property and the massacre of foreign residents.

It has been stated very freely and largely, Mr. President, that such plans were entertained by the insurgents and their friends, and I think it is only proper that if there is any information within the possession of the Government we should have it. It has been said quite recently that some of the sympathizers with the insurgents in Manila proposed to throw dynamite bombs into the funeral procession of General Lawton and to take advantage of the confusion thereby arising to create disorders in the city. It seems to me that that is a subject of importance, upon which we ought to have all possible information.

Also any information that may have come to him of the treatment of the other inhabitants of the Philippines by those in arms against the authority of the United States and of the attitude and feeling of such other inhabitants or tribes toward the so-called government of Aguinaldo and his armed followers.

It has been stated in an article published by Professor Worcester, of the Philippine Commission, and in other quarters by persons whom I suppose to be well informed, that there was great hostility amongst many of the inhabitants and tribes to the Tagalo tribe, of which Aguinaldo is the representative; that they dislike the Tagalos, that they have resisted their domination, and that Aguinaldo and his followers have exercised reprisals against them and have plundered their villages. That seems to me an important point to get information upon, if there should be any in the Department.

Also any information that may have come to him of the treatment of prisoners, either Spanish or American, by the people in arms against the authority of the United States.

There have been many statements in regard to that. I think it was stated in debate the other day that the Filipinos treated prisoners with extraordinary humanity; but considering the account recently published of Lieutenant Gillmore's experiences, the statement that has been widely disseminated of the execution and mutilation of wounded American prisoners, and the treatment of Spanish prisoners, it seems to me if it be the desire to do no injustice toward anybody, we ought to have information upon that point as well.

Also any information that may have come to him as to any aid or encouragement received by Aguinaldo and his followers from persons in the United States; as to what pamphlets, speeches, or other documents emanating from the United States, and adverse to its authority and to its policy, were circulated in whole or in part among the Filipinos in arms against the United States, among the other inhabitants of the island, or among the soldiers of the United States; and any information as to the effect, if any, of such pamphlets, speeches, and other documents, or of similar utterances in the United States upon the course of the rebellion against the United States.

In his very brilliant and interesting speech the other day the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] stated that there had been a great effect produced by documents of this character and by utterances in the United States in encouraging and inciting rebellion and in keeping it alive. The statement was made in a most serious manner. My colleague [Mr. HOAR] in his reply denied absolutely the possibility of such a thing, and it is a very grave question, as it seems to me. If there is any evidence upon that point, we ought to know it.

It was also stated by the Senator from Indiana that there were persons calling themselves Americans who had furnished arms and other more material aid to the insurgents. It was also a matter of very general report last summer—and I think generally understood—that persons connected with what is called, I believe, the Anti-Imperialist League had been circulating documents among the soldiers of the United States, urging them to oppose the war and to leave their colors. I do not think those efforts had much effect. It was a sort of dabbling in treason, from the penalties of which the persons who engaged in it were protected by their insignificance and by the fact that no sensible man wants to convert a bore into a martyr, even if he is a malevolent bore.

Those things, I think, ought to be known if there is any evidence or any testimony—

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. RAWLINS. In view of the suggested information covering so many points now made by the Senator from Massachusetts, does he not think it would be well to call upon the President to furnish in chronological and consecutive order all the communications and information in his possession relating to the Philippine question from the time the negotiations began on the 24th day of April, 1898, when the first interview between a representative of the United States and Aguinaldo took place? Following that up will doubtless reveal the fact that Admiral Dewey, under the direction of the President—

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yielded for a question. I do not think it is quite fair for the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. RAWLINS. I will only complete my sentence—that Admiral Dewey furnished arms to the Filipinos.

Mr. LODGE. I think—

Mr. RAWLINS. It will appear from that, if the Senator will permit me, what were the aspirations of the Filipino people as disclosed to the President. It will probably follow from that what the Administration knew would be the consequences of an effort on the part of the United States to defeat those aspirations. The suggestion I make is whether or not the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines will not propose a resolution covering the entire ground in that way.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I am endeavoring to do, Mr. President.

I think the resolution offered by my colleague, with the amendment which I have suggested, will cover every possible phase of the question, and will enable us to procure, so far as the President deems it not inconsistent with the public interests, an absolute account of everything that has happened.

When the Senator interrupted me, I was about to read the last clause of the amendment I propose, which is as follows:

Also any further or other information which would tend to throw light upon the conduct and events of the insurrection against the authority of the United States in the Philippine Islands and of the military movements for its suppression since January 1, 1898.

That seems to me to about cover everything.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. RAWLINS. I simply desire to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if he means January prior to the beginning of the Spanish war—January, 1898?

Mr. LODGE. The 1st of January, 1898, certainly covers everything.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not cover the President's proclamation.

Mr. LODGE. The 1st of January, 1898? That was three months before the war began.

Mr. RAWLINS. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. Eighteen hundred and ninety-eight I said, not 1899—the 1st of January, 1898.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator's resolution cover those documents which passed between Admiral Dewey and our consuls prior to the war, or after it began, before which time we could not possibly claim those people to be insurgents or in insurrection against this Government? They were insurgents against Spain. But under the wording of the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and that of his colleague [Mr. HOAR], that matter is not embraced in this inquiry. There is nothing said about a naval officer in the resolution. What we want to get at is the whole correspondence which has passed between the Filipinos and the officers, civil, military, and naval, of the United States from the beginning of this trouble.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not see how anything could be more sweeping on that point than the inquiry framed by my colleague.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator permit one other question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. Why does the Senator fix January 1, 1898?

Mr. LODGE. Because I wanted to put the date so far back that it would bring in everything that preceded the Spanish war, and so that it would carry everything that could possibly be brought in.

Mr. RAWLINS. The point of my inquiry is simply this: If the Senator proposes to go into the question of the insurrection and the relations between the insurgents and Spain prior to the inception of the Spanish war, he ought to go back beyond that. If he does not intend to go into that subject at all—

Mr. LODGE. We are not inquiring into the relations of the insurgents with Spain.

Mr. RAWLINS. That is what I wanted to ascertain.

Mr. LODGE. No; I am not seeking information as to that. I do not suppose our Government has information on that subject. We were not the custodians of the insurgents then or of Spain. What we want is every shred of information in regard to our relations with the insurgents.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, I did not know but what he was also aiming to get into the disputed question as to whether Aguinaldo sold out to the Spaniards.

Mr. LODGE. I do not care whether he sold out or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. We know he did.

Mr. LODGE. I am not seeking evidence for or against Aguinaldo's character. What we want to get is all the information upon all these points which throw light on the insurrection against our authority in the Philippines, what led to it, and all that concerns it in any possible way. It was my intention, by making these additions to my colleague's resolution with the last sweeping clause, that I have drawn to bring in everything. I do not think there is any disposition to withhold anything, and I think that Senators will find that the resolution as framed will bring every possible document or information that is possessed by the Government.

Mr. HOAR. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion to him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to his colleague.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. This discussion is upon a resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], but it has been directed wholly, or nearly wholly, to a proposed amendment to the resolution offered by me, which is to come up a little later, I suppose.

I should like to say that I entirely approve the purpose which my colleague has avowed, and everybody knows that any purpose which he avows is his purpose and that he is absolutely frank about this matter, as about all matters, public or private.

I wish to express my entire general accord with what he has said and what he desires; but I should like to have distinctly inserted, what I understand my colleague will have no objection to, a direction to transmit to the Senate the President's instructions to the body known as the Philippine commissioners, and I should like to have also distinctly inserted "all correspondence between the President and our commissioners at Paris." But I shall not press that now, because I suppose, I conjecture, at any rate, that there will be some opposition to that on some specific ground not affecting the general subject. I merely take this occasion to express that desire without saying I shall undertake to press it. But I should like to have this resolution, if it is to be amended—unless my colleague will let his go as a separate resolution and let mine stand—contain a distinct request for the instructions to the Philippine Island commissioners.

Then I should like to have the resolution so worded that all this matter will not come in in one enormous document of 10,000 pages. I desire that the information on these specific subjects may not be delayed for the completion of the whole thing, but that it may be communicated in some shape where it will be compact and by itself. Nobody can comfortably study and argue a great subject of this kind if the document before him is in the form of the Encyclopedia Britannica without an index. I think my colleague will agree with my desire that the President shall not delay one part of the information until all of the information called for by the resolution is obtained.

Mr. LODGE. That is contained in the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I wish that information should not be delayed in answer to one part of the resolution for that in answer to another part; but that separate topics should come in, so that they can be separated in the publication if it shall be found desirable by the Senate. But I accept, so far as I am concerned, the suggestions of my colleague.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The resolution before the Senate is one that I introduced, but the Senators from Massachusetts seem to be discussing a resolution which is not before the Senate. It would seem to me that it would be better to dispose of the resolution which I have offered before we take up this other subject, for I desire very much to have the resolution which I have offered adopted and the information which I seek furnished.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota offered a resolution relating to one single transaction in the Philippines, which is entirely covered both by the substitute I offered and still more specifically covered by the resolution offered by my colleague. It does not seem to me that we want to ask for specific information and then follow that request up with sweeping resolutions which cover the subject. It seems to me that it would be better, if the Senator does not desire to withdraw his resolution, that we should lay his resolution and the resolution which I offered as a substitute for it upon the table, then take up the resolution of my colleague and amend it so as to satisfy the Senate that it covers every possible phase of information, and then pass it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that both of the Senators from Massachusetts should make such inquiries as they choose and seek such information as they desire. I think it is entirely proper. If they believe the information is necessary in order that they may the better discharge their duties, they ought to seek it, and the Senate should give them the opportunity to do so.

Of course the details of the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] might be considerably extended in the pursuit of valuable information for the public. We might inquire whether our soldiers did not desecrate churches and plunder sanctuaries; whether they did not kill prisoners, murder women, burn houses, rob the persons of the inhabitants of the country, both men and women, of their jewels, and so on, covering the usual train of horrors which follow the operations of hostile armies in the field.

It seems to me that my resolution is exceedingly pertinent. It pertains to questions the people of the United States ask to have answered. They want to know what our course has been in regard to the Philippine people previous to the commencement of hostilities, what our course was immediately after hostilities began, what our relations were to those people, and whether or not war on our part is justified. Certainly no nation should wage war unless there is the best of cause and unquestioned justice on the side of the aggressor. For the purpose of ascertaining these pertinent facts, as they seem to me to be, I introduced a resolution on the 12th of December, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the flag of the Philippine republic was carried by vessels in the bay of Manila, and whether the flag of the Philippine republic was ever saluted by Admiral Dewey or any of the vessels of his fleet at any time since May 1, 1898. Were Spanish prisoners delivered over to the Philippine forces at the time of the surrender at Subig Bay? Did a vessel commanded by the forces under Aguinaldo, flying the Philippine flag, accompany the vessels Concord and Raleigh back to Subig Bay in June, 1898, in order to compel the surrender of the Spanish forces?

One object in offering this resolution was to ascertain whether or not the Filipino people had been the allies of the United States Army and Navy; whether we had operated with them against a common enemy. The resolution was laid upon the table on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and the only reason given for this attempted suppression of information was that if the Senate passed the resolution, such action would be telegraphed immediately to the insurgents.

The object of concealing conditions or operations in time of war must be to keep from an enemy information it does not already possess. If what I state in the resolution is true, the facts were well known to the insurgents at the time the facts were created. If we saluted their flag, they knew it; if their vessels came from Subig Bay to Manila, and if they asked Admiral Dewey to assist them in the conquest of the Spanish garrison at that place, and our vessels went back and captured the garrison and turned the prisoners over to the insurgents, the insurgents knew it at the time. Therefore the passage of the resolution or the promulgation of the facts to the American people could not encourage the enemy.

Mr. President, the object in this suppression of information is to keep from the American people certain transactions which after history will record. The trouble with these imperialists is that they confound the Government of the United States with their puny President. The trouble is that his interests are paramount to the interests of the whole people of this country, and that the desire for political success has more bearing upon grave questions than the mere encouragement or nonencouragement of the insurgents. My resolution was laid upon the table. The information asked for was denied. I want it answered specifically, because I think it is pertinent to this controversy.

On January 8 of the present year I offered another resolution—that is, the pending resolution—which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether General Torres, one of the officers of the Philippine army, came to General Otis with a flag of truce on February 5, 1899, the day after the fighting commenced between our forces and those of the Filipinos, and stated to General Otis that General Aguinaldo declared that fighting had been begun accidentally and was not authorized by him, and that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of a width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflict between the two armies, and whether General Otis replied that fighting having once begun must go on to the grim end. Was General Otis directed by the Secretary of War to make such an answer? Did General Otis telegraph the Secretary of War on February 9, 1899, as follows: "Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference. Have declined to answer?" And did General Otis afterwards reply? Was he directed by the Secretary of War to reply, and what answer, if any, did he or the Secretary of War make to the application to cease fighting?

This resolution embodies direct questions. They are pertinent questions, and upon them I desire information.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if he has information that the contents of the resolution are true?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not assert in the resolution that the contents are true, but I believe they are true; for if they were false, every imperialist in this body would be in great haste to secure replies, and they would have passed my resolution without any delay whatever.

Mr. ALLEN. Has the Senator any information in his own possession about the truth of the assertion contained in the resolution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will reach that subject later. I will come to it in the course of my remarks.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to know, because I am in hearty sympathy with the resolution, and I think it ought to pass. I do not think there is anything of such a sacred character that the American people should not know it, this being a Government by the people and for the people.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will come to that, Mr. President. The facts recited in the resolution are facts, and they are therefore true. I am much obliged to the Senator from Nebraska for bringing out this fact at this time. I will produce abundant proof of these facts later on in my remarks.

Mr. President, is war such a flippant thing to engage in that when an enemy with whom we are fighting declares that the conflict was not intentionally commenced and desires to cease fighting in order that peace may be restored and the killing of men stopped, we should answer that the war having commenced, it shall go on to the grim end, and when later—but a few days later—the request for a cessation of hostilities is again made, our general telegraphs to the Administration that he has declined to answer. It seems to me the questions are so pertinent, so pointed, so important. Mr. President, that they ought to be the subject of a separate resolution; not be clouded by a series of events which have occurred since, not clouded by these horrible deeds which occur on both sides when men are engaged in shedding each other's blood.

Therefore I believe that resolution is important. Any other resolutions which may be presented covering other phases of this controversy will not be objected to by me. If information is wanted by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I am willing he shall secure it. But I want these questions—these two or three pertinent questions—answered, and answered directly and at once. That is why I object to the substitute. The substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts is what? It reads as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to send to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, all reports and dispatches relating to the insurrection in the Philippines, and especially any information as to communications or correspondence with the insurgents, from the 1st of January, 1898, on the part of any officer in the military, naval, consular, or diplomatic service of the United States.

I have no objection to that information being secured, but I do not wish to have action delayed on these two great important questions until the information desired by the Senator from Massachusetts can be secured; neither do I care to leave discretion to the President as to whether his reply shall be in accord or consistent with public interests. The people of the United States, who are sovereigns in this country, have a right to know the facts regarding which I ask.

Leave it to the discretion of the President! Why, this resolution, Mr. President, should be amended so that it will accord with the facts. The President himself is unable to distinguish between his own interests and the interests of his country, between the political contest which is about to come on and the question of the destiny and duty of the United States. This resolution might be changed so as to read: "If not inconsistent with the interests of the President as a candidate for reelection," for that will govern the answer we shall get. The concealment of news, the suppression of facts, has marked the course of this miserable and wretched transaction from the beginning.

Even the report of General Otis, which is sent to us purporting to give a history of the war, does not contain all the facts and was either censored at this end of the line or the other. It does not contain his report of the 6th of April, which gives an account of how the fighting commenced and who inaugurated the war. It does not contain MacArthur's report, before whose forces the fighting was begun. MacArthur describes the opening of hostilities, but that report was not included. It does not give any recital since the war commenced of repeated efforts on the part of the insurgents to cause the cessation of hostilities; it does not give the telegram which Otis sent to the Department dated the 8th of February, 1899, and which is as follows:

Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference; have declined to answer.

His report does not contain that exceedingly important telegram. Fighting commenced on the 4th. On the 9th General Otis telegraphed the Department that Aguinaldo desired to cease fighting and have a conference, and that he had not answered. There is no reference in the report to so important an incident as the officially expressed desire of the commander of the enemy to stop the effusion of blood.

There were innumerable efforts on the part of Aguinaldo to stay the tide of war. He sent flags of truce time and time again, accompanied by communications, asking if hostilities might cease; and what General Otis did with those messages of good will, and what the Department here did with them, is not contained in Otis's report; all were censored out of it. For what purpose? The facts are known to the insurgents. They are not known to the people of the United States. They were omitted to conceal the true situation from the people of the United States.

That is not all, Mr. President. This process has been going on at both ends of the line. Of Otis's telegrams, of Otis's reports, it is well known that only portions were given to the American people. Negotiations with regard to the Sulu agreement were mangled and partially denied until after the election in Ohio. The President himself sent a proclamation to General Otis, which I will read. It is dated the 21st of December, 1898:

PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain by their respective plenipotentiaries at Paris on the 10th instant, and as a result of the victories of the American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands are ceded to the United States. In fulfillment of the rights of sovereignty thus acquired and the responsible obligations of government thus assumed, the actual occupation and administration of the entire group of the Philippine Islands becomes immediately necessary, and the military government heretofore maintained by the United States in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila is to be extended with all possible dispatch to the whole of the ceded territory.

Here, then, is a declaration on the part of the President that we had acquired sovereignty by purchase and that we proposed to extend a military government over the entire group of the Philippine Islands. What was the situation on that day? We occupied simply the city of Manila and a small promontory about 20 miles from the city.

Mr. HOAR. What is the date of that proclamation?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The 21st day of December, 1898. The city of Manila was invested by the army of the Philippine republic. That army had built earthworks from water to water, 14 miles in length, clear around that city, hemming in the Spanish garrison at the time the city was surrendered, and the position of the Filipinos was maintained up to the date of this proclamation. This was the message sent to a government exercising jurisdiction over millions of people, maintaining an army of 30,000 men surrounding the city of Manila, occupying only the country they had conquered and captured from Spain. Then the President goes on:

In performing this duty, the military commander of the United States is enjoined to make known to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands that, in succeeding to the sovereignty of Spain, in severing the former political relations of the inhabitants, and in establishing a new political power, the authority of the United States is to be exerted for the sovereignty of the persons and property of the people of the islands and for the confirmation of all their private rights and relations. It will be the duty of the commander of the forces of occupation to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come, not as invaders or conquerors, but as friends, to protect the natives in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights. All others will be brought within the lawful rule we have assumed, with firmness if need be, but without severity so far as may be possible.

Here was a direct declaration of war. Lay down your arms, submit to our sovereignty, to our military rule throughout the whole of these islands, or we will proceed against you by force of arms and compel you to do so. What is the use, after the issuance of this proclamation, of quibbling about who commenced the war?

But General Otis, fearing that something might occur that would be disagreeable in this connection, did not give out the proclamation sent to him. He altered it materially. He altered it so that it was not the same proclamation. He altered it so that it read as I shall now read. This is to the people of the Philippine Islands:

Instructions of His Excellency the President of the United States relative to the administration of affairs in the Philippine Islands have been transmitted to me by direction of the honorable the Secretary of War, under date of December 28, 1898. They direct me to publish and proclaim in the most public manner to the inhabitants of these islands that in the war against Spain the United States forces came here to destroy the power of that nation and to give the blessings of peace and individual freedom to the Philippine people; that we are here as friends to the Filipinos; to protect them in their homes, their employments, their individual and religious liberty, and that all persons who, either by active aid or honest endeavor, cooperate with the Government of the United States to give effect to these beneficent purposes will receive the reward of its support and protection.

The President said all those who surrender, all those who yield, will have protection, and those who do not will be caused to yield by force of arms. Mr. Otis, feeling that this proclamation of the President was too harsh, that it might involve trouble, censored it, as the President has evidently censored Otis's report. So Otis was willing to deceive, swindle, and defraud the people of the Philippines by putting out a proclamation which was not transmitted to him to issue, and the Administration is willing to humbug the American people at this end of the line with a meager report of the facts in regard to this whole subject.

The entire wretched business is one of duplicity and concealment—an evident effort not only to deceive the people of the United States, but the people of the Philippine Islands. But as soon as General Otis received this proclamation he sent it to General Miller, down at Iloilo, and Miller promulgated it exactly as he received it, and within four days the genuine proclamation was back in Manila and all its brutal phrases were presented to the people there. They were suddenly stunned by the edict which declared war against them and which so unexpectedly announced that they should not have their liberty, for which they had sacrificed so much life and so much property.

Mr. GALLINGER. What were those brutal phrases? I should like to have one or two of them read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will read them to the Senator:

All others will be brought within the lawful rule we have assumed, with firmness if need be, but without severity, so far as may be possible.

A straight and square declaration of war—an announcement that if you do not surrender, if you do not lay down your arms, if you do not give up your liberty, we will make you do all these things by force of arms. The other is as follows:

The military government heretofore maintained by the United States in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila is to be extended with all possible dispatch to the whole of the ceded territory.

The military government of the United States was to be extended over those 30,000 men in arms and over that government of a sister republic, founded upon a constitution similar to ours. I am glad the Senator from New Hampshire asked the question, for I have thought for a long time that those who are maintaining this policy on the part of the United States were ignorant with regard to the facts and stood in need of information.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it strikes me that his declaration that those expressions of the President's message are brutal is absolutely refuted by reading them. The President of the United States used no brutal language and has not done so during the period of hostilities.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now, Mr. President, let us see what General Otis says about this matter. If we have an ally and he has been fighting with us and has lost thousands of men in contact with a common enemy, for his advantage and for ours, and he has established a government and has helped us capture a city with a garrison of 13,000 men, and we then turn around and say to him, We have purchased title, from the persons whom we have been jointly assailing, to your country and to your land, and if you do not lay down your arms and surrender to us the liberties for which you have been contending, we will make you do it by force of arms. And if that is not brutal language and that is not a brutal course, then the estimate of these things placed upon them by the Senator from New Hampshire must be quite different from what has been placed upon them by the history of the world through all time.

Otis says, with regard to this proclamation, as follows:

Before publication of this proclamation I endeavored to obtain from able Filipino residents of the city an expression of opinion as to its probable effect upon the population, but was not much encouraged. A few days thereafter they declared the publication to have been a mistake, although the foreign residents appeared to believe the proclamation, most excellent in tone and moderation, offered everything that the most hostile of the insurgents could expect, and undoubtedly would have a beneficial influence.

Perhaps the proclamation which Otis put out, if it had not been for the President's proclamation itself, which came to them from Iloilo, might have been tolerated. How do we know? Otis sends out a lie to insurgents; Miller sends out the truth. A few days afterwards the truth comes, and then the difficulty of course ensues. Here is what he says with regard to the President's language:

After fully considering the President's proclamation and the temper of the Tagalos with whom I was daily discussing political problems and the friendly intentions of the United States Government toward them, I concluded that there were certain words and expressions therein, such as "sovereignty," "right of cession," and those which directed immediate occupation, etc., though most admirably employed and tersely expressive of actual conditions, might be advantageously used by the Tagalo war party to incite widespread hostilities among the natives.

Remarkable, is it not, that such words as "sovereignty" and "cession," such words as "conquest" and "oppression," might have disturbed the inhabitants? How gratifying it must be to the President to have this censor of his praise the Executive language!

So, Mr. President, the war was commenced, and yet the insurgents used every effort and every endeavor to prevent actual hostilities. I think I can prove from the record that such was their course.

But before I conclude with regard to this censorship question I want to call attention to the report of the Associated Press. Robert M. Collins, who represented the Associated Press in Manila, in connection with the concealment of facts and of truth from the people of the United States, makes the following statement in an interview which the press representatives had with General Otis. He threatened to court-martial the correspondents for sending the truth to the United States. Mr. Collins says:

But when General Otis came down in the frank admission that it was not intended so much to prevent the newspapers from giving information and assistance to the enemy (the legitimate function and, according to our view, the only legitimate one of a censorship), but to keep the knowledge of conditions here from the public at home, and when the censor had repeatedly told us, in ruling out plain statements of undisputed facts, "My instructions are to let nothing go that can hurt the Administration," we concluded that protest was justifiable.

In other words, Mr. President, the purpose of the censorship in Manila was not to keep facts from the enemy, not to keep information from the enemy, but to keep it from the people at home, the people of this great Republic. We have adopted a new policy along with the adoption of an empire and a pseudo emperor—a policy of no longer taking the American people into our confidence and consulting them with regard to questions of great national moment. Our military censors are instructed not to cut out from the dispatches sent to the newspapers in this country that which might help the enemy, but that which might hurt the Administration at home. Such instructions are issued by the Administration itself, and the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy must be obeyed by his subordinates. Military power is imperial, and the imperialist employed it not for the country's good, but to attain personal political ends.

Continuing, Mr. Collins says:

Otis had gained the idea, from the long submission by the newspaper men to his dictation, that it was a part of the duty of the Governor-General to direct the newspaper correspondents as he did his officers. Much of the censorship was conducted by him personally, the censor sending a correspondent to the General with any dispatch about which he had doubts. The process of passing a message was identical with the correction of a composition by a schoolmaster, Otis or the censor striking out what displeased him and inserting what he thought should be said; or, what came to the same thing, telling the correspondent he must say certain things if his story was to go.

And in this way these correspondents say they were compelled to send falsehoods home to us. What is more, Mr. President, further, Mr. Collins says:

Recently I filed what I thought a most inoffensive statement that the business men who had appeared before the commission had advocated the retention of the existing silver system of currency. The censor said: "I ought not to let that go. That would be a lift for Bryan. My instructions are to shut off everything that could hurt McKinley's Administration. That is free silver."

Now then, Mr. President, I object to the resolution or amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts because he proposes to leave to the President the discretion as to whether I shall have my questions answered or not. How can I leave that to the President and expect to get the information when he instructs a censor to deny to the American people the facts for fear that the truth will hurt his Administration? How can we expect to be given the facts when Otis's reports suppress everything almost that would be of importance as against the conduct and course of the Administration and gives us that only which he chooses to divulge?

Now, Mr. President, who commenced the war? I contend, in the first place, that the President inaugurated hostilities before the treaty with Spain was ratified, when he sent his declaration of war to Otis to be transmitted to the people of the Philippine Islands. What is more, Mr. President, Mr. Otis, in his report, in the first letter he wrote to Aguinaldo after he took command, made the statement which I shall read. I might preface this by saying that at the time Manila fell the insurgents had conquered the island of Luzon. The Spanish flag floated over only one port. They (the Filipino republic) had occupied many of the other islands, and shortly afterwards captured the city of Iloilo.

Their troops had taken 10,000 Spanish prisoners. They had captured garrison after garrison. They had several small vessels which patrolled the coast flying their flag. They surrounded Manila with a cordon of earthworks. They had 30,000 men in the trenches. When General Merritt went there, he asked the insurgents to allow him to land his forces on the beach in order to take the city of Manila. He sent General Greene, who was instructed not to recognize Aguinaldo or his forces, to try and avoid that, but nevertheless, by some hook or crook, to get a lodgment upon the beach. I will read from the statement of Francis V. Greene, major-general, with regard to this matter:

General Merritt arrived at Cavite in the Newport on the afternoon of July 23, and, after examining the ground the following day, promptly decided two points: First, that the attack would be made along the shore; and second, that it was necessary to get the insurgents off to one side, so as to give us the right of way. He was very anxious to avoid any entangling alliances with Aguinaldo, with whom he had no direct communication. He therefore sent his chief of staff, on the afternoon of July 28, with a verbal message directing me to persuade the insurgents, if possible, to evacuate a portion of their trenches; but I was to do this on my own responsibility and without intimating that I had any instructions to this effect from him. I had previously met General Noriel, who commanded the brigade of insurgents nearest to the beach, and on receiving General Merritt's message I sent my orderly, who spoke Spanish fluently, to find this general and give him a most polite message that I desired to see him on matters of common interest.

What was the purpose of the President? When General Merritt was sent to the Philippines he went with different instructions from those which had been previously given. Previous to that time Aguinaldo had been armed by us, taken to the islands by us, had declared constantly that he wished to set up a government of his own, and that his people desired independence and had adopted a constitution, had established a government, and that they had consulted with Dewey about it. Dewey had said in one of his dispatches that he went ashore to consult with the Filipino people with regard to the establishment of a civil government. Their flag had been saluted.

Spanish prisoners had been turned over to their government. But suddenly the policy of the Administration changes, and the departure was instigated by England, in my opinion, for the tone of the English papers about this time changed. They began to talk about our duty in the Philippines. The men who were dominating England were opposed to war with Spain because they held Spanish bonds. They were in favor of our conquering the Philippines because they would like to get more of the bonds of the United States. The great money oligarchy which has ruled the world for the last twenty or thirty years, dictated the march of armies, and the movement of navies, bidding war to commence or war to cease, has now crossed the Atlantic, and is to-day wielding the destinies of the great Republic and directing every movement, every thought of the servile President of this most corrupt and un-American of all Administrations.

So General Merritt was to try to fool the Filipinos and prevail upon them to do what he wanted and not let them know what was his purpose. He was armed with different instructions from those that had been given to anyone else. He tells General Greene to get possession of a piece of the shore; to do it without letting the Filipinos know that he recognized them in any way, but to accomplish it. Aguinaldo said he would give possession of the shore if they would make the request in writing. Upon that he withdrew his troops from the trenches and our troops took possession of 400 yards of Aguinaldo's works, from the shore part way around Manila. Without giving the request in writing, we simply promised that it should be sent the next day. This is contained in General Greene's statement.

Now what occurred? Manila surrendered. It was 14 miles around Manila, and of that 14 miles all but 400 yards was occupied by the Filipino forces. When the city surrendered we took 13,000 Spanish prisoners, according to General Greene's report, and there was no fighting. In fact, the surrender had been arranged. We were simply to make a demonstration and then the Spanish garrison was to lay down its arms. They were to give themselves up to us that they might avoid capitulating to the Filipinos, who had surrounded them. Thus the surrender of the Spanish forces was secured without bloodshed, except for an accident, or except for such bloodshed as the generals commanding our armies thought was necessary in order to humbug the insurgents, so they would be content to allow us to enter the city without them.

Immediately upon our occupation of the city we began to push the insurgents back. We gave them nice talk. We told them we were their benefactors. We pointed to our resolution with regard to Cuba. We declared that we had the highest motives and that conquest would not be thought of—that it was immoral. Thus we gained possession of one point after another.

In demanding the retirement of the Filipino troops the first letter which Otis wrote to Aguinaldo is as follows. Aguinaldo had protested against retiring from territory which he had conquered by sacrificing the blood of his men. A parley ensued.

On September 8, 1898, General Otis forwarded to Aguinaldo this communication, the first one he had sent to that officer:

It only remains for me to respectfully notify you that I am compelled by my instructions to direct that your armed forces evacuate the entire city of Manila, including its suburbs and defenses, and that I shall be obliged to take action with that end in view within a very short space of time should you decline to comply with my Government's demand; and I hereby serve notice on you that unless your troops are withdrawn beyond the line of the city's defenses before Thursday, the 15th instant, I shall be obliged to resort to forcible action, and that my Government will hold you responsible for any unfortunate consequences which may ensue.

Here, then, on the 8th of September was a declaration of war, a threat to an ally who had done as much against the common enemy as we had done.

Permit me to believe that my confidence in the sound judgment and patriotism of yourself and associates is not misplaced.

We were parleying with Spain. It was long before the treaty was made and many months before it was ratified.

You will please pardon me for my apparent unnecessary delay in replying to your communication of the 27th ultimo, but press of the duties connected with the administration of the affairs of this city is my excuse.

In conclusion, I beg to inform you that I have conferred freely with Admiral Dewey upon the contents of this communication and am delegated by him to state that he fully approves of the same in all respects; that the commands of our Government compel us to act as herein indicated, and that between our respective forces there will be unanimity and complete concert of action.

Now, this is Otis's report, from which I read:

On September 13 a commission sent by Aguinaldo and consisting of three members, one of whom was the treasurer and another the attorney-general of the insurgent government, called for the purpose of discussing the subject of my letter of the 8th. They asked me to withdraw it and simply request in writing that the insurgent troops retire to the line designated by General Merritt, which I refused to do, stating that unless they withdrew as directed we would be obliged to resort to force.

Pretty talk, is it not, toward an ally who was fighting with us? If this Administration had a spark of honor when they sent General Merritt there they would have told the whole truth in his instructions to the insurgents, would have told them that they had nothing to expect but slavery at our hands, instead of still parading as their friends.

They then asked that I withdraw the letter and issue a request unaccompanied by any threat to use force as Aguinaldo was fearful that he would be unable to remove his troops upon a demand, to which I replied that the letter of the 8th instant would stand. They then said that as the demands of that letter must remain unchanged, the insurgents would withdraw as directed therein, but that if I would express in writing a simple request to Aguinaldo to withdraw to the lines which I designated—something which he could show to the troops and induce them to think that he was simply acting upon a request from these headquarters—he would probably be able to retire his men without much difficulty; that, of course, they themselves understood the direction to withdraw, which would be obeyed, and thereupon repeated their desire to obtain a note of request, whereupon I furnished them with the following:

Then comes a request simply to withdraw, designating the line, and this request was complied with.

Now we complain and the Administration justifies its commencement of the war upon these people because they were uneasy during this time; that threats were heard; that assertions were made that they had a right to independence. Aguinaldo issued a proclamation in answer to the President's proclamation, declaring that he sought independence for his people.

Now, Mr. President, who did begin the war? Here is Otis's letter of the 8th of September, saying that he would resort to war if they did not surrender to him some of the territory which they had conquered from Spain. Here is the President's proclamation, saying, "If you do not surrender the islands on the 21st of December, I will wage war against you to the death."

What is more, it is well to inquire who fired the first shot. It appears that there was a town between the lines of the two armies, occupied by the forces of Aguinaldo—a town 150 yards in advance of the line of the American troops—and that Otis wished to obtain possession of it. He therefore entered into an agreement to have Aguinaldo withdraw his pickets therefrom and retire to a greater distance.

This was done. On the night after this had been accomplished a patrol of the insurgents entered the abandoned town. A patrol is not a war party; a patrol is simply to pick up stragglers. They had occupied the place the night before, and they sent a patrol in the evening to see if any of their men had remained behind—if there were any stragglers in this village. We had occupied the place as a picket station, and when these Malays, who do not speak our language, came along, a Nebraska boy ordered them to halt, and they did not halt.

It is very strange, is it not, that the insurgents did not understand the Spanish or the Malay tongue of the Nebraska boy? He fired upon them and killed a lieutenant, and within a few minutes two or three more Filipinos were killed; and thus the war was begun. And who started it? We commenced it by the declaration of war on the part of our President, by every act of ours which indicated that we did not propose to give them their freedom. We inaugurated the conflict by killing the first man. But what does General Otis say about this? On page 92 of this report you will find the following statement:

It is not believed that the chief insurgent leaders wish to open hostilities at this time—

It is not believed they wished to open hostilities. Let us see. On the same page he describes the battle of Manila:

The battle of Manila commenced at half past 8 o'clock on the evening of February 4 and continued until 5 o'clock the next evening.

The engagement was one strictly defensive on the part of the insurgents and of vigorous attack by our forces.

Here, then, Mr. President, is the killing of two or three or four Filipino soldiers who composed the patrol, which was not a war party, by a picket of ours; and then what? "The engagement was one strictly defensive on the part of the insurgents and of vigorous attack by our forces." Then we rushed upon their works, and the killing and destruction were well under way. We took their trenches and drove them back. And yet it is claimed by the President, in his proclamation, that the Filipinos struck a foul blow. Who really struck the foul blow? Who was guilty of duplicity? Who was guilty of deception through the whole of this miserable transaction?

General Otis conceals the rest of the facts. The report of General MacArthur is not here, but I have read the reports of various soldiers, for the South Dakota troops were along this line. I have talked with many of them, and there is no possible question but that we were first guilty of shedding blood; that we began the attack, and that we followed it up.

What occurred, Mr. President? General Rives, of Minnesota, who was in charge of the city of Manila at the time fighting commenced, in an interview said:

But I can tell you one piece of news that is not generally known in the United States. On Sunday, February 5, the day after the fighting began, General Torres, of the insurgents, came through our lines under a flag of truce and had a personal interview with General Otis, in which, speaking for Aguinaldo, he declared that the fighting had been begun accidentally and was not authorized by Aguinaldo; that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of any width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflicts between the two armies. To these representations of General Torres General Otis sternly replied that the fighting, having once begun, must go on to the grim end.

Mr. SPOONER. What date was that?

Mr. PETTIGREW. February 5.

Now, Mr. President, under all these circumstances, I would like to know what more Aguinaldo could have done. What more could he have done than continue to fight as long as resistance was possible? If I were a Filipino, I would fight until I was gray, if I were not killed before, against this unholy and infamous aggression.

I do not indorse the sentiment, Mr. President, of the Senator from Nevada, that having once commenced we must go on. That would compel him to join his brother if he found him stealing. That would compel him, if he found his comrades committing any crime, to join in the crime until it was consummated. If we are wrong, this Government can take no higher or grander position before the nations of the world than to acknowledge it.

My country, right or wrong, is a sentiment I indorse with this qualification: When right, to keep it right, and when wrong, to make it right. Neither do I confound the President with the Government. He is but our servant, and if he pursues a wrong course, if he precipitates us into a war unjustly and wrongfully and undertakes to override the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence, then I am against him, and it is my privilege to attack his position.

I believe he is wrong in this contest. I believe my country can only be great and grand by pursuing that honorable course which has marked our career in the past, and by exercising that powerful influence which we can exercise and have exercised all over the world since we became a nation, because of the honor and dignity of our course and the respect we have always maintained for the rights of others. We have reached the turning point.

Are we to abandon this grand history; are we to pursue a course of aggression and wrong, plunder and robbery, on the English principle that having once commenced we must continue to the end? What would we think of the greatest athlete of the world to-day in insisting that, having begun the beating of a boy of 12, he should beat the boy to death in order to convince the world that he was strong?

Mr. President, if it takes more courage to do right than to do wrong, then the American people and the American nation should commence at once. Empire has been acquired before only to ruin the nation that started upon a career of conquest. Rome with her legions robbed the world. When the Roman Empire was founded most the people owned 12 acres apiece—12 acres per family—indicating a dense rural population. No foreign foe could march through that compact rural population of land owners to the wall of Rome. They were successful farmers and prosperous, and they made mighty soldiers. Cincinnatus left the plow and led legions on to victory. But during the first century of the Christian era centralization had done its work; the lands had been absorbed by the usurer and gathered into vast estates, cultivated by tenants and often by slaves.

Spain once had an empire which covered almost the world—greater than Rome or any other people ever acquired. Where is Spain to-day? No nation can pursue a course of wrong toward others and long preserve its own liberties. No nation can long give to its people happiness and prosperity, equality, necessary to the preservation of its institutions, when it proceeds to disregard the rights of other nations or plunder other men, no matter what the color of their skin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator yield for one moment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not care to proceed further. I am perfectly willing to yield the floor.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution which has been under discussion—that of the Senator from South Dakota, and mine, offered as a substitute—will now go to the Calendar, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly, unless some arrangement is made regarding the matter.

Mr. LODGE. Then the resolution of my colleague will come up on another day without any question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has gone over one day and that will go to the Calendar. The same is true of the resolution offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague and I, as I understand, are entirely in accord—that is, I have no objection to his amendment. On the other hand, I desire to insert one line in mine, which he entirely approves. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order may be laid aside that this resolution, with my colleague's amendment, may be adopted without debate. I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. That can not happen. There will be debate; and I shall object to any such arrangement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let me first have my resolution disposed of. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to state that in the statement made by him he was in error. When a resolution which lies over one day is considered and the consideration of it is not completed it goes to the Calendar. When resolutions are not considered (and the Chair supposes that neither the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts nor that of the Senator from Maine has been considered to-day) they will still lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. That was my understanding of the situation.

Mr. HALE. They do not lose their place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They do not lose their place.

Mr. HOAR. Very well, if that is understood. Otherwise I could bring in another resolution which would come up in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the ruling of the Chair that the resolutions still lie on the table.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have my resolution disposed of. At least, I should like to make a request in regard to it. I ask that it may lie on the table without prejudice, and that it shall not lose its place.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that his resolution may lie on the table without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER. I will state that I shall call up in the morning hour to-morrow the census bill for the purpose of endeavoring to secure action upon it, and I can not be a party to any agreement which would preclude the possibility of doing that.

Mr. HOAR. It does not seem to be fair to interpose against these resolutions the census bill, and I appeal to the Senator's good sense of justice and fairness. Here are some Senators, and I am one of them, asking for information which they regard as most essential to the discharge of important public duties and the understanding by the Senate of the greatest question we have had before us for a generation. My colleague, representing the committee on that subject, comes to the Senate and concurs in the view as to the importance of the matter, and he asks simply that my inquiry be enlarged, which it certainly ought to be if any Senator on the floor wants to enlarge it. I have no objection to that and we have agreed on the resolution. Now, to say that the census bill shall be taken up out of order in the morning hour for the sake of preventing our getting the resolution through seems to be a proceeding which I hope the Senator will not insist upon.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the regular order. It is very evident that this discussion will go on indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR. These questions will be debated on their merits.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Massachusetts can take his own course.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Do I understand that my resolution goes over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Response was not made to the announcement by the Chair of the request of the Senator from South Dakota. Is there objection made to his resolution retaining its place on the table?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will renew the resolution to-morrow. If you can throttle debate on this question, you will have to do it.

Mr. LODGE. For convenience, I ask permission to have my colleague's resolution printed with the amendments I have offered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have one amendment which is not in there printed.

Mr. LODGE. That amendment I have inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the junior Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: A moment ago the Senator from South Dakota asked unanimous consent that the resolution which he offered might remain on the table. I raised objection, but at that time I supposed the Senator had concluded his speech. I understand that he has not concluded it, and for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to do so I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will then put the question again. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the resolution submitted by that Senator will lie on the table without prejudice.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am surprised at the proposed legislation, the shadows of which already darken the hopes of the confiding victims of Wall street. It is so utterly contradictory of the St. Louis platform of the Republican party that it will astonish the country. That platform declared that—

We are, therefore, opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

There were in the United States in 1896 between five hundred and six hundred millions of standard silver dollars and very nearly an equal amount of standard gold coin. Both the silver and gold coin were full legal tender and each one was standard money in the same sense in which the other was standard money. If five hundred millions of legal-tender gold money created a gold standard, then five hundred millions of full legal-tender silver money created a silver standard. Therefore, if there was a gold standard in 1896 there was also a silver standard. The Republican party was pledged to maintain the gold standard that then existed.

The standard money of the country in the act of November 1, 1893, which is the last legislative action on the subject, is described as follows:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money.

This last expression of the will of Congress recognizes silver coin as standard money equally with gold coin. There is no objection to maintaining gold as a standard money equally with silver, for the law so declares.

Secretary Carlisle, the modern Moses of the gold standard, in the revised edition of Circular No. 128, issued July 1, 1896, stated the law as follows:

Gold coins and standard silver dollars, being standard coins of the United States, are not redeemable.

LEGISLATIVE POWER INVOKED TO SILENCE CRITICISM.

The Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. ALDRICH, in his explanation of the bill under consideration, said:

Although United States notes and Treasury notes are by law redeemable in coin, the invariable practice of the Treasury Department since 1879 has been to redeem them in gold coin. * * *

It is to allay the doubts which have been raised and to dispel the fears which have been aroused by the persistent antagonism of the friends of the free coinage of silver and the advocates of a silver standard to all sound monetary principles that this legislation is necessary.

The admission of the Senator from Rhode Island that it is necessary not only to violate the platform of the Republican party but to enact into law the usurpations of the Treasury Department in discriminating against silver in the payment of debts shows that the facts and law of the case are against the contention of the advocates of gold and that they are under the necessity to use the legislative power of Congress to silence just criticism. The enactment into law of the policy of the Treasury Department, which is in palpable violation of the statutes of the United States, would condone the sale of bonds by the Cleveland Administration, whereby somebody (not the Government) pocketed about $30,000,000. The $162,000,000 of 4 per cent bonds sold by the Cleveland Administration realized $30,000,000 less than the market price of such bonds both before and since the outrage was committed. The excuse for this robbery of the Treasury of the United States was the false pretense that gold was necessary to meet the obligations of the Government, whereas in fact those obligations were payable in silver as well as gold, and there was an abundance of silver in the Treasury to meet the same. The Democratic party repudiated Cleveland and his coworkers for this and similar transactions, and such betrayals of trust should remain forever repudiated. The effort to legalize such transactions will certainly encourage further usurpations in the Treasury Department.

SILVER COIN FULL LEGAL TENDER.

The Senator from Rhode Island makes another admission which destroys his whole contention. He says:

Our own experience and that of other countries, notably France and Germany, clearly prove that it is possible to keep in circulation at a parity of value with gold a large but limited amount of legal-tender silver or notes based upon such silver without any provision for a compulsory redemption in gold.

The Senator ignores the fact that the standard silver money circulating in Germany, France, and the United States is a full legal tender equally with gold. It performs all the money functions that gold can perform, and of course it remains at par without redemption. It needs no redemption; it is its own redeemer as much as gold coin.

It is true the Senator from Rhode Island in his admission says that although the amount of legal-tender silver coin in circulation may be large, it is limited, but he failed to state the limitation. He did not follow the example set by Mr. Sherman when Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Cleveland when President. Secretary Sherman in 1890 was quite confident that $50,000,000 of standard silver dollars was the utmost limit that would float on a par with gold; and President Cleveland in December, 1893, was positively sure that the limit of the amount of standard silver dollars which would circulate on a par with gold had been reached when there had been coined under the Bland-Allison Act only 215,759,431 standard silver dollars. But the coinage went on under the Bland-Allison and Sherman Acts until over 500,000,000 of standard silver dollars were put in circulation, and still standard silver dollars are on a par with standard gold dollars. In 1893 President Cleveland, the banks, and his Republican followers in the two Houses of Congress repealed all laws providing for the coinage of silver. What evidence is there, if the coinage of silver had continued, that standard silver dollars would not have remained on a par with standard gold dollars? There is certainly nothing in the monetary history of this or any other country which justifies such a conclusion. There never was in the United States a full legal-tender dollar, whether printed on gold, silver, or paper, which was not as good as every other legal-tender dollar in circulation.

The silver coin and the silver certificates representing coin now in circulation in the United States are not only as good as gold coin, but very much better, because they stay at home and do the business of the country. The Boer war does not make them desert this country to be naturalized under the mint laws of England to fight the Boers and thereby create a panic in New York. If all our money were silver, silver certificates, and greenbacks, with no gold whatever, the Boer war would not have disturbed the finances of this country by depressing prices, destroying values, and creating stagnation in business.

ARTFUL DESTRUCTION OF THE SILVER DOLLAR.

The Senator from Rhode Island did not proclaim in so many words that the object of the Senate substitute bill was to destroy the silver dollar. In fact, a casual listener might have understood that he intended to leave the silver dollar untouched. His mode of attack on the silver dollar is very artful.

The Senate substitute provides for the issuance of an unlimited quantity of 3 per cent gold bonds, principal and interest payable in gold, and also for the refunding of the entire national debt into gold bonds. When that is done, silver will be deprived of its debt-paying power. It will be crippled in the same way that the greenback was crippled in 1862 through the machinations of Wall street, by depriving it of the functions of paying customs dues and interest on the public debt. That wicked legislation was carried over the solemn protest of Thaddeus Stevens, the great commoner from Pennsylvania, who declared that such action would cost the United States more than a thousand million dollars. Upon the crippling of the greenback a gold board was organized in Wall street to make war on our armies in the rear while they were fighting the enemy in front. Depriving the greenback of its full legal-tender power did more harm than any financial legislation in the United States previous to the clandestine scheme of 1873 demonetizing silver.

While 500,000,000 legal-tender silver dollars, with their representative certificates, constitute our active and reliable circulating medium, we are told that legislation which destroys the legal-tender power of the silver dollar to redeem greenbacks and pay the national debt is maintaining the gold standard as it existed in 1896. If the Republican party had declared in the St. Louis platform that the standard silver dollar was to be abolished—as it is by this bill—it would not have been successful in the last Presidential election. If that party thought otherwise, why did it pledge itself to promote bimetallism by international agreement? Does anybody doubt that hundreds of thousands of votes were secured for the Republican party in the belief that that party would secure bimetallism and that an international agreement was the best mode of restoring silver?

The country will understand that a gold standard which excludes the silver standard of 1896 is a very different standard from the gold standard which existed in common with the silver standard, and in which silver possessed the same functions as gold.

NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

The contention that national-bank notes are better money than standard silver coin or legal-tender paper issued directly by the Government can not be maintained. Why does it make money better to issue it to national banks and guarantee its redemption than to issue it directly by the Government and cover it into the Treasury, to be paid out in lieu of money obtained from taxpayers? It is very easy to see how the conversion of a thousand millions of noninterest-bearing money, consisting of standard silver dollars, greenbacks, and Treasury notes, into money bearing interest, payable to the banks, would be beneficial to the banks, but in what way the Government or the people are to be benefited I am unable to understand.

The whole scheme is in violation of the fundamental principles of monetary science. There has been much cruel legislation on the money question to reach a metallic basis consisting of both gold and silver, but never before in the history of the world has an attempt been made to regulate the volume of money by the accidental production of gold alone, the yield of which is the most uncertain and erratic of all the metals, whether precious or otherwise.

It was the silver of the New World which revolutionized the Old and broke up the feudal system. If silver had been demonetized at the time Columbus discovered America, the people would have remained serfs and progress would have been impossible, because there would have been no gold mining previous to the discoveries in California and Australia if there had been no silver mining. Nearly all the gold produced in America previous to the discovery of the great alluvial deposits of California and Australia was found in combination with silver as a by-product and could not have been otherwise mined. But, on account of the production of silver being more regular and constant and it not being so fleeting and transitory as gold, it formed the basis of a new civilization. It is a lamentable fact that money has never been studied as a science, and its creation and regulation has never been governed by fixed principles.

VOLUME OF MONEY REGULATES PRICES.

Ignorance, inattention, and cupidity have deprived the world through all the ages of an equitable measure of value. It is universally agreed that the property for sale and the money in circulation are reciprocally the supply and demand for each other. Learned and fair-minded economists agree that the volume of money controls general prices and that the property for sale is a measure of the money in circulation in the same sense that the money in circulation is a measure of the property for sale. This being conceded, it follows that money can not be a fair and equitable measure of value unless the ratio between the property for sale and the money in circulation can be maintained relatively uniform. In order to honestly measure the value of property it will require the same amount of money to buy a like quantity of property, considered in the aggregate, at one time that it does at another time.

POWER TO CREATE MONEY.

It is impossible to regulate the quantity of property for sale so as to keep a constant ratio between it and the volume of money, because all the people have an unlimited right to produce and sell property. Money, on the other hand, is the creation of law. No private person, either natural or artificial, can create money without special authority of law. The material used upon which to stamp or print money is no more the money itself than the paper upon which a will is written or a law is printed is the will or the law. This doctrine was announced by Aristotle more than two thousand years ago, and its truth can not be questioned. That the creation of money is a sovereign power was adjudicated by the highest tribunals in the British Empire at the time of Elizabeth and by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Legal-Tender Cases, and is therefore final.

Every independent nation has been compelled in times of emergency to save its national existence by creating legal-tender money without regard to the material upon which it was stamped or printed. Suspension of coin payments and the use of paper conquered Napoleon and placed Great Britain at the head of nations as a military and financial power. The legal tender left in the greenback, even after it was deprived of its function of paying customs dues and interest on the public debt, saved the Union. It is the law of legal tender that makes gold, silver, or any other material which bears the mandate of the Government money. Money is created by the sovereign power of Congress and is manifested by the stamp or imprint of the Government in the same way that printing on paper makes known the statute law of the land. Every taxgatherer must respect and obey the law of legal tender for the same reason that he obeys any other municipal law, because it commands the creditor to take the paper or metal bearing the governmental stamp in payment of the debt due him, and this, too, without regard to the material upon which the mandate is manifested.

There was great industrial prosperity in Great Britain immediately after the battle of Waterloo, and there was equally great business prosperity in the United States immediately after the surrender of Lee at Appomattox. But in each case that prosperity was lost by legislation destructive of the legal-tender money of the country which had created the prosperity. England, after the Napoleonic wars, suffered more in five years by legislation destroying the money of the country than from all her military expenditures of twenty-two years under suspension of specie payment. The United States suffered more in the ten years following the cessation of hostilities by the wicked policy inaugurated by Secretary McCullough and his coworkers than by all the expenditures of that tremendous war. Destruction of Government money and the substitution thereof of bank paper, or, what is worse, the commodity gold alone, has, in the language of a distinguished public man, done more harm to civilization than famine, pestilence, and war combined.

The Government being the only source of legal-tender power, it is its duty to keep in circulation that quantity of money which will at all times bear a uniform relation to the property for sale and thus be a just and equitable measure. The suggestion that a commodity, whether it be gold, silver, wheat, cotton, beef, or anything else, will have the same quantitative relation at all times to all other commodities is obviously impossible. The world has tried for several thousand years to maintain an honest measure of value by the use of both gold and silver. This was much more satisfactory than the use of one of these metals, because two commodities are not likely to change their relation to all other commodities as frequently or as rapidly as a single commodity. If one half of all commodities were measured by the other half, the changes between the aggregate of the two halves might not be very violent. Hence the advocates of silver have contended and still contend that if gold is to be used silver must also be used to avoid fluctuations which are disastrous to civilization.

CIVILIZATION AND PROGRESS FOLLOW PRODUCTION OF PRECIOUS METALS.

My investigation leads me to the conclusion that every preceding civilization has come into existence with productive mines and disappeared with their exhaustion. This is because the volume of money has been limited to the supply of gold and silver. Prosperity and progress as invariably follow an increasing supply of money as night follows day; and poverty and want have always followed the exhaustion of gold and silver mines. Mining for gold and silver during the fourteen hundred years preceding the discovery of America was an unknown industry. The property of what was once the Roman Empire was gradually drawn together by the deathly grasp of contraction into feudal trusts. A few feudal lords rioted in luxury, while the great mass of the people became serfs and were sold with the land.

Gold and silver from the New World revolutionized the Old, and in thirty years after Mexico and South America commenced pouring out their treasures a Luther appeared, and all Europe was in the throes of reformation. The new money gave new life and created modern civilization. For three hundred years and until the commencement of the present century the product of silver, with a little gold, continued to flow without cessation. Then the Spanish-American wars interrupted mining, and Europe suffered financial depression for nearly half a century. In the United States the money famine was less disastrous than in Europe, because the great Mississippi Valley was open to all who would come and make a home. When the supply of public lands was fast being exhausted, and when Europe was in the throes of revolution, the gold of California and Australia came to the rescue and created an era of prosperity throughout the world which had no parallel in previous history.

DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER.

The cupidity of the creditor class to enhance the value of money and obligations payable in money induced Europe and America to cease printing legal tender upon silver and to print it upon gold alone. The demand for gold was so increased by this legislation that in twenty years an ounce of gold would buy as much property in general as 2 ounces of gold would have bought in 1870. The United States obtained partial relief from this drastic contraction by the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 and the so-called Sherman Act of 1890, by which over five hundred millions of new money was printed on silver and put in circulation. The repeal of all laws for coining silver into money took place in 1893, and thereupon the business of the country was paralyzed. In the last four years, according to the Director of the Mint, there has been an output from the mines of the world of over a thousand millions of gold.

This enormous and unprecedented output of gold has reduced its purchasing power, or, what is the same thing, has enhanced the price of property. The worshipers of gold call attention to the fact that the country is more prosperous now than it was three years ago, and argue that the gold standard has accomplished this result. They overlook our large war expenditures and the fact that while the supply of gold was shrinking prices were falling, and that prices did not cease to fall until the supply of gold was greatly augmented. If they would give this matter a little thought they would see that it is the quantity and not the quality of gold which has given prosperity, because the quality of gold during all our years of adversity was the same as it now is. The check in the fall of prices and the advance already gained by the new supply of gold proves the contention of the silver men. They never pretended that there was anything in the quality of silver that would make good times, but they did contend, and do now contend, that an increase in the volume of money is what makes good times, and that silver would accomplish that desirable object as well as gold.

I will not elaborate, but will defy anyone to give an instance of great prosperity in any country, in any age, when there was not at the same time an increasing supply of money, and I also defy anyone to name a time of prosperity when there was a shrinking volume of money. The limitation of the supply of legal-tender money to the commodity gold creates a fluctuating measure of value. If the gold standard had been adopted on the discovery of the precious metals in the New World the feudal trusts would not have been disturbed by the output of gold. Von Humboldt, the best authority we have, tells us that from the discovery of America until 1803, 44 ounces of silver were produced to 1 of gold, and we know, as a matter of fact, that nearly all the gold that was produced during that period was found in combination with silver. If silver had not been used as money the silver mines of the New World would have remained untouched and very little, if any, gold would have been produced. It was the silver mining of the New World which quadrupled the amount of coin in the civilized world during the first hundred years after the discovery of gold and silver in Mexico and South America. It was silver mining that enhanced the price of property during that same century more than 200 per cent, increased the land holders of Great Britain from 30,000 to 100,000, made tenants landlords, and serfs tenants.

INCREASE IN PRODUCTION OF GOLD.

No great gold mines were known to exist between the commencement of the Christian era and the discovery of gold on the American River in California in 1848. The discovery of gold in Australia soon followed. These discoveries revolutionized the finances of the civilized world. The annual output of gold rose in a few years from $18,000,000, in 1840, to $134,000,000 in 1856. The annual yield thereafter gradually declined, and between 1881 and 1885 fell below $100,000,000. Since that time there has been a continuous increase, and within the last few years that increase has been phenomenal, until the annual output is estimated to be over $300,000,000. How long this increase in the product of gold may continue no one can predict. The South African war will have a disturbing effect by cutting off a large supply. But whether or not the output has reached its maximum, it is unreasonable to suppose that such enormous yields will be continuous. On the contrary, gold mines are easily and rapidly worked out, and experience teaches us that they are as certain to be exhausted in the future as they have been in the past.

Is it wise to select gold as the only money metal and rely on it as a commodity which will always bear a permanent and unvarying relation to all other commodities when the history of the past shows that its yield is the most uncertain and fluctuating of all the valuable metals? Reasoning from the past and from the very nature of things, if this metal is adopted as the only material upon which money can be stamped, disaster must follow. When both metals were used for monetary purposes we had periods of prosperity and progress, and as long as one of them or the two combined furnished an adequate supply of money all went well; but the supply of money was seldom constant, even when both were used. The mining of both metals sometimes failed, and barbarism swept over the land. It was fortunate for preceding generations that the people were not quite foolish enough to commit the mistake which is now proposed. If the mines of both metals were occasionally exhausted, producing financial ruin, such calamities were less frequent with the two metals than they would have been with one alone.

DEMANDS OF INDIA.

In addition to the certainty that the gold mines now being operated will soon be exhausted and that others may not be found, the recent action of Great Britain in putting India on a gold basis will make an enormous drain upon the gold of the world. When the 900,000,000 rupees and all the paper circulation in that country are made redeemable in gold, India will practically absorb the recent phenomenal output of gold. The drafts on this country for gold are the rumblings of a financial earthquake which may shake the foundations of political parties in the next Presidential campaign.

GOVERNMENT DEPRIVED OF BENEFIT OF ISSUING MONEY.

The bill under consideration deprives the Government of all the benefits resulting from the exercise of its sovereign power to create legal-tender money.

There are now in circulation $563,000,000 in silver dollars and silver certificates representing silver dollars, $346,000,000 of United States notes or greenbacks, and $21,000,000 of currency certificates issued under the act of June 8, 1872, making a total of $930,000,000 of paper and silver coin doing duty as money under authority of law upon which the Government pays no interest.

The House bill contemplates the retirement of this $930,000,000 of circulation and the substitution therefor, so far as the banking syndicate may deem it profitable, of national-bank circulation, upon which the people will be compelled to pay 3 per cent interest. It is true the people do not pay interest on the bank notes as such, but they do what amounts to the same thing, pay to the banks 3 per cent on bonds which cost the banks nothing, because the banks get their money back which they paid for the bonds when they receive their circulation. This 3 per cent is practically a subsidy, or rather a gratuity to the banks for doing what it is the solemn duty of the Government to do.

The nominal tax of 1 mill on the dollar of capital stock of the banks is a very trifling internal-revenue tax which the banks will manage to collect from the people. The subsidy will, however, not stop at $25,000,000, because the growth of the country will require more circulation and the banks will receive more subsidies. This subsidy is a very small part of the voluntary contribution which this bill makes to the banking trust. It gives that trust the power to increase or decrease the amount of circulation, which means the power to absorb wealth as fast as the toiling masses can produce it. The money syndicate can at pleasure make money scarce, destroy values, then go "long" on property everywhere, put out more money and make it plentiful, boom prices, unload; then again contract the currency, go "short," ruin everybody that booming prices had induced to go in debt, start anew to take in property at a nominal price, and boom and sell again. This process can be repeated every year by the syndicate which the House bill organizes. The scheme of the House bill, which the Senate bill honey coats a little, seems to be based upon the theory that the people have no rights which the powers that control the Government are bound to respect.

NATIONAL DEBT TO BE MADE PERMANENT.

In addition to paying interest to the banks for the money issued to them and the sacrifice of the rights of the people to a colossal monopoly, a vast national debt is to be created and maintained for the purpose of paying subsidies to the banks and keeping an enormous reserve of idle money. Why is the Government compelled to maintain a reserve to redeem money in circulation, if it be money? The idea of redemption implies credit. Money is a mandate; it is a law requiring the creditor to take the metal or paper upon which that mandate is indicated by the stamp of the Government in payment of his debt, and there is no more necessity or propriety in redeeming real money than there is in redeeming a law against larceny or murder.

The advocates of this bill tell us that the Government can not be trusted to issue money because it will issue too much or too little. If the Government can not be trusted to issue money, why was that power conferred upon the Government in the Constitution? If the Government itself can not be trusted to issue money, how can it be trusted to delegate that authority to a banking syndicate or any other class of speculators? Again, it is said that the Government can not properly regulate the quantity of money; that it must be regulated by gold alone, so that it can not be disturbed. The quantity of money was regulated by both gold and silver for thousands of years. Did the money manipulators have any respect for immemorial usage or the rights of the people when they used the legislative power of the civilized world to exclude silver because they had a monopoly of gold?

HOW QUANTITY CAN BE REGULATED.

If I am asked how the quantity of money can be regulated by law, and honestly regulated, I will say that a money stamped on metal or paper, representative of all property for sale, clothed with unlimited legal-tender quality, redeemable in debts and taxes, and of a proper volume, would be an ideal money. If such money were established, and the Secretary of the Treasury were required to pay it out in lieu of all other money now in the Treasury, or hereafter to be received; if he were further required to destroy all other money of whatever description in, or to be in, the Treasury, and to sell, as bullion, all gold and silver in, or to be paid into, the Treasury, and to replace it all with the newly-established money, the volume of circulation in the country would thereby be neither increased nor diminished, but it would consist of a single circulating medium, which, to the exclusion of all other money, would be clothed with the money function and legal-tender power.

Does anybody doubt that the only money which would pay debts and taxes in the richest country in the world would be the best money? Every resident and every foreigner desiring to buy property or pay debts or taxes in this country would be compelled to have it. Would not such a demand be sufficient? If it be contended that the present supply of money is adequate, it can not be maintained that it will continue to be so. The growth of population and business constantly increases the demand for money, and the supply must also be increased to prevent contraction. The percentage of increase of population is known, and a like per cent of money could be added by covering into the Treasury a further amount of representative money in lieu of taxes, and the paying out of the same for current expenses.

The increase of business might require a greater percentage of increase in the volume of money than the growth of population would indicate. In that case it would be necessary to resort to that certain and reliable gauge of the volume of money which is found in the general range of prices. Competent and reliable statisticians might be employed to investigate prices and ascertain whether general prices were rising or falling. If rising, the amount of money covered into the Treasury from time to time might be diminished, and if falling, an increased supply must be found, until stability in general prices should be restored and maintained. It is the volume of money which regulates general prices, and by the rise and fall of general prices any excess or deficiency in the volume of money in circulation is shown.

The reason why general prices and the volume of money respond and correspond to each other is because the money in circulation and all the property for sale are reciprocally the supply and demand for each other. The confusion which exists with regard to the relation between money and prices arises from a comparison of isolated articles or commodities with money. The demand for money is equal to the demand for all other things, because it is the universal order for property; but the demand for each kind of property is limited. Its value, as compared with other property, and its price in money depend upon the supply and demand of the particular kind of property. The fluctuations in price or value of every description of property, in obedience to the law of supply and demand, have no effect upon the aggregate value of all property offered for sale, for that value is dependent solely upon the total supply of money.

MANDATE OF GOVERNMENT MAKES MONEY.

The statement of the Senator from Rhode Island that Germany, France, and the United States have large amounts of legal-tender silver money in circulation at par with gold without any promise of redemption shows the practicability of such a scheme, and also that it is the mandate of the government, and not the material upon which it is stamped, which creates good money. This fact is further illustrated by the relation between gold and silver through all the ages previous to 1873. The relative price of these commodities in the market always corresponds to their coinage value. Although the gold produced between the discovery of America and the discovery of gold on the American River, in California, was less than one-fortieth part in weight of the quantity of silver produced, still an ounce of gold would always buy 15½ ounces of silver; and between 1850 and 1870 the gold produced was as much as one-sixth of the weight of the silver produced, and still an ounce of gold continued to buy 15½ ounces of silver, showing that it was the legal-tender function applied to each metal that made it money and maintained the parity between the coins of the two metals. The fact that the weight of the silver in the world is at the present time about sixteen times as great as the weight of the gold in the world would seem to indicate that the ratio of 16 to 1 established by law is in accordance with the common judgment of mankind. Certainly no change ought to be made in the ratio in the light of any existing facts, and particularly in view of the fact that the outstanding obligations of the Government are payable in gold dollars containing 25.8 grains of standard gold, or silver dollars containing 412½ grains of standard silver. This includes our most recent bond issues, and it is hoped that it will include all that may be issued in the future. The suggestion of Secretary Sherman of continuous additions to the weight of the silver dollar shows his ingenuity and genius in assisting the gold standard.

Such a system as I have suggested would require no national debt to maintain it, no subsidies paid to banking syndicates, no rigging of the market for stockjobbing purposes, and no dishonest practices to rob the people. What a contrast that would be with the present plan of an enormous and increasing national debt; of the unlimited power of the banking syndicate to expand and contract the currency and to lower and raise prices at will; of the millions extorted from the people by subsidies to banks; of the ever-present danger of the inevitable fluctuations in the output of gold. Let the people look on this picture and then on that and choose for themselves.

If the Government would resume its functions and issue its own money, the tremendous load of national debt under which the people must forever groan and struggle would be avoided and an honest and equitable measure of value would be constantly maintained.

DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN BONDHOLDERS.

If bondholders belonging to the banking syndicate receive from the Government the amount of money which their bonds cost in the form of circulating notes, and at the same time draw interest on their bonds, why should not all bondholders have the same privilege? Why should not everybody who invests in United States bonds retain his bonds and have his money back from the Government?

If the object of this scheme of finance is to put money in circulation, why limit the privilege to the banking trust? There is no doubt that the banks would be willing to receive from the Government two or three thousand millions of money if the Government would pay them 3 per cent per annum for accepting the donation, and there might be others not connected with the banking trust who would be willing to do likewise.

What is meant by the hackneyed phrase, "the gold standard," has not been fully explained. When we speak of standard weights and measures our meaning is plain, because a yard is a fixed length and a quart or a bushel contains an ascertained quantity of space. Money, to be a standard in the sense of accurate measurement of value, must be of such volume as will always bear a uniform relation to the aggregate of property for sale. To contend that money which is of a greater purchasing power at one time than it is at another is a just standard of value is like contending that a yardstick 50 feet long, if made of some particular kind of wood, would be the same standard of measurement as a yardstick 3 feet long. If money can be an honest standard measure of value, and the same money can measure five times as much property in the aggregate at one time as at another, why may not a gallon which includes five times as much cubic space at one time as it does at another be an accurate measure of quantity?

The contention of the advocates of the gold standard rests upon the assumption that the quality of gold is the only question considered in commercial exchanges. They deny that either the supply or the demand for gold has any effect in estimating the quantity of any particular commodity which a given amount of gold will buy. Their contention also assumes that if all the mountains were gold an ounce of gold would buy the same amount of wheat, cotton, or other products that it will now buy. This is the intrinsic-value theory of men who look as wise as Harrison, Cleveland, or Bynum when they announce to the world the necessity of money possessing intrinsic value.

The Secretary of the Treasury is not so absolutely ignorant of monetary science as his contention that the value of gold never changes would seem to indicate. In his reply to the resolution of the two Houses of Congress respecting his transactions with certain New York banks, he gives as a reason for depositing the money of the Government in national banks that it is necessary to do so to avoid contracting the circulation, and that to keep it in the Treasury would disturb the business of the country.

It seems a little strange that the Secretary can understand that locking up money in the Treasury vaults disturbs business and at the same time thinks it is necessary to use only the commodity gold upon which to stamp money, although every foreign financial trouble takes gold out of the country and deposits it in foreign vaults. He contends that money to be good money must be made of the same material that all other nations use for that purpose, and he can see no inconvenience in its withdrawal from circulation in this country by foreigners, while he understands that hoarding money in the Treasury is injurious to business.

In his lectures on gold he confines his arguments in favor of the exclusive use of that metal to its peculiar qualities, claiming that it possesses intrinsic value, while in administering the Treasury he regards the volume of money in circulation as of paramount importance, and deposits the surplus of the Treasury in banks to keep it in use and prevent contraction. Still, he contends that no matter how much gold or how little gold is produced, its volume when used as money does not affect its purchasing power.

It is passing strange that business men shape their transactions in view of the probable supply of money, but when they discuss the money question they follow the example of the Secretary and assert that the quality of the material used as money is the only question of importance, without regard to the volume in circulation. Is it not singular that people can not see the absurdity of the intrinsic-value theory, while in every kind of business, industrial as well as speculative, they act on the quantitative theory of money? In their business they have in view the supply of money, but many of them in their arguments follow the teachings of the Cleverlands and the Harrisons and maintain that all they want is intrinsic value in the money in circulation, no matter whether the volume is large or small.

In the early legislation of this country a dollar was denominated the unit of account. No one was vain enough to suppose that a dollar of gold or silver was an unerring measure of value. Value is simply estimation. It is relative and results from the comparison of the relative desirableness of things and is determined by the estimation of man. Money, in order to be a just standard of value, must bear such a relation to property in general that it will command in exchange the same amount of property, considered in the aggregate, at one time that it does at another. The value of gold varies more radically on account of its sporadic production than that of any other commodity, and the comparison of all commodities with gold alone makes property fall and rise in a most injurious and destructive manner.

Why should gold be the standard of all things any more than some other thing should be the standard of gold? To say that gold is an exact measure and standard of value is to utter a doctrine manifestly more absurd than the flat-world theory, for which formerly men who doubted its correctness were burned at the stake. But the advocates of the so-called gold standard, which means the limitation of legal-tender money to the fluctuating and capricious supply of gold, assign the following reasons in support of their contentions:

1. They assert that it is necessary for the commodity upon which money is stamped to possess intrinsic value, and that such intrinsic value is confined to gold. A complete answer to this contention is that there is no such thing, in a monetary or commercial sense, as intrinsic value. Value is not a material thing nor a quality of a material thing. Value is the estimation of buyers and sellers in making contracts. If value were an intrinsic quality it would require chemistry, and not market reports, to determine the value of wheat, pork, or cotton. Useful qualities of things have much to do in controlling estimates which create value, but it does not follow because a thing is useful or necessary that it is valuable in a commercial sense. The air we breathe is essential to animal life, but it possesses no commercial value because it can be had without purchase. A quart of water on the Mojave Desert is more valuable than a quart of water at a mountain spring, because the supply on the desert is very limited and the demands of a thirsty traveler are excessive. Value can only exist in a commercial sense where there is a demand and a limited supply. If there is no demand, there is no value. If there is no limit to the supply, there is no value. Consequently, the value of things depends upon the law of supply and demand, which controls the judgments of men in exchanging property or buying and selling it.

2. It is contended that gold money is necessary to settle international balances. A full answer to this contention is that international commerce is confined exclusively to an interchange of commodities. Money as such is never used to settle international balances. Metal money is as much a commodity outside of the jurisdiction creating it as pork or hay. The fact that gold is used upon which to stamp governmental edicts creating money throughout the commercial world makes it a disastrous factor in human affairs. As gold deserts one country for another, it breeds depression and panic; whereas money without commodity value would do duty at home and stay there in time of need. The Baring failure in 1890 and the Boer war now pending show the disastrous effects of the universal use of gold as a commodity money. If our money were stamped on silver—a commodity too weighty and bulky for quick desertion—and paper, which is thoroughly domestic, financial stringencies, and failures abroad, and foreign wars would not materially injure this country. On the contrary, they might benefit us by increasing the demand for our products.

Bondholders and speculators may enjoy advantages over the masses of the people by juggling with gold, but every country, when its national existence is threatened, banishes the traitor gold and creates money that will stay at home and furnish an honest circulating medium. The fact that international commerce has been carried on from time immemorial by countries using different kinds of money and different kinds of material upon which to stamp or print money refutes the contention that any one commodity, whether it be gold, silver, wheat, or pork, is essential to international trade. I will not question the motives of those who contend that gold is necessary as money to carry on international commerce, but will compliment them by saying that they are not much more ignorant than were the advocates of the flat-world theory or the devotees of witchcraft.

THE HOUSE BILL.

Under ordinary circumstances at least two-thirds, and perhaps three-fourths, of the circulating medium of the United States, if the House bill becomes a law, would be national-bank notes, and the amount of such circulation would be under the control of a legalized trust known as the national banks. These banks are owned and controlled by members of the National Banking Association, who meet from time to time and determine the policy of the banks. The few men who control the policy of the banks will also have control of the stock exchange through a few leading brokers, whom they will take into their confidence. The trust which controls the banks, the volume of money, and the price of stocks, by playing fast and loose with the volume of money, will control the destinies of this country.

When this bill shall be in full operation a colossal money and property trust will be created which will overshadow the money trust which put the Roman Empire in liquidation. The money syndicate of Rome, through cruel laws for the collection of debts, sold the great mass of the people into slavery. The people were called nexi because they were annexed to the land as serfs and sold with the land as slaves. The feudal lords were the legitimate offsprings or descendants of the money powers which destroyed Rome. The world has marveled at the colossal fortunes which were consolidated in the great trust when the fall of Rome began. The consummation of this legislation will present a combination of wealth and power in comparison with which its Roman prototype will dwindle into insignificance. The question is, Will imperial wealth and degraded serfdom curse the United States as they did the empires of old? The passage of this bill would seem to answer that question in the affirmative, but I still have faith in the American people that they will be aroused to the danger before it is too late and apply the remedy.

This proposed legislation may prove a boomerang and destroy the powers which formulated it. It certainly ought to show the people, if nothing else will, the deception which has been practiced upon them by the Goldites for more than a quarter of a century. There has been no election in the past twenty years in which the great mass of the people of all parties did not believe that they were casting their votes in favor of bimetalism. It is true the language of the platforms of both parties, except the Chicago platform of 1896, was somewhat obscure and ambiguous, but the two parties contended each with the other that it was a better friend of bimetalism than its antagonist. The bold departure proposed by this bill from the professions of all parties in every election since silver was demonetized may attract the attention of the people and inspire them to apply a remedy. If it does, great good will come from the folly, avarice, or stupidity of the advocates of gold contraction.

COMBINING AND LEGALIZING TRUSTS.

There are in the United States combinations the operations of which are harsh, unjust, and oppressive. Such grievances can not be remedied by railing against all business corporations and combinations, because cooperation is the basis of civilization, without which society could not exist. There are bad men in every community, and it would be just as absurd to rail against all men because some are bad as it is to cry out against business combinations because some are oppressive. The remedy against crimes of individuals and the extortion of corporations must be such as will reach the wrongdoers without including good people with the bad and legitimate industrial associations with conspiracies to extort money.

The Government need not be a party to oppressive or robbing monopolies, and above all governmental authority which permits or authorizes extortions or oppressions ought not to be created. I am unable to conceive of a greater monopoly than the power to issue and control the volume of paper money in this country. Such power would control the whole business of the country, including all other trusts and monopolies. There is no provision in the organic act of any constitutional government on earth which delegates the money-creating power to individuals or corporations; on the contrary, every government reserves to itself the sovereign power to create money by law, the only method by which full legal-tender money can be created. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof."

The Supreme Court, in the Legal-Tender Cases, holds that that power includes the power to stamp money on metal, paper, or any other material upon which the mandate of the Government can be impressed. Much is said against the Standard Oil trust, the sugar trust, the railroad combinations, the steel trust, and other industrial and speculative organizations. When this bill shall become a law, will not the Rockefellers, the Havemeyers, and the Carnegies avail themselves of the extraordinary powers delegated to the banking syndicate and form the controlling power in that syndicate? How can individual enterprise compete with the organized capital of the country clothed with the sovereign power to issue and control the circulating medium? It is to be hoped that no person who votes for or advocates this bill will ever be heard complaining of any trust, however extortionate it may be, because he should bear in mind that he voted to establish and maintain that very trust and place it under the protection of the laws of the United States.

ELASTIC CURRENCY.

It is asserted by the advocates of a banking trust that an elastic currency is necessary and that the banks will so regulate the volume of the circulating medium as to furnish the exact volume of money required at all times. Will not the banks, if they have power to contract and expand the volume of money, contract and expand it for their own benefit? Will they not, when it is for the interest of their broker associates, contract the money volume and force down prices? And, again, will they not, when it is for the interest of themselves and their associates, expand the currency, put up prices, and reap a harvest? To put the power to contract and expand the currency into the hands of a banking syndicate for the alleged purpose of securing an elastic currency is to put this india-rubber currency trap into the hands of the banks with which to ensnare producers and to spring when it is full of game.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE TO FRAME LEGISLATION.

The particular provisions of the House bill or the Senate substitute need not be examined in detail. The general purpose of the legislation is very clearly defined by the House bill, and the Senate substitute will place the whole matter of framing the details of the bill in the hands of a conference committee, and when it comes back for the consideration of the two Houses it will not be amendable. In fact, it seems that the Senate bill is a sort of "shifter," and the two bills may be compared to the loose and tight pulleys used in machinery. The loose pulley is called a "shifter," which simply carries the belt when the machinery is at rest. The Senate bill will carry the belt of legislation until the real power is exercised in conference, and then the belt will be slipped upon the tight pulley and the wheels of legislation will be put in motion.

I will, however, call attention to some of the provisions of the House bill. It has a sweeping clause which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to buy up and retire silver certificates, Treasury notes, United States notes, and silver coin by the use of gold borrowed on the bonds of the United States. The general language is as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to use said reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the United States, and if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of the money of the United States, he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States.

But for the sake of concealment, or some other purpose, the mode of retiring all the moneys of the Government, except gold, is elaborated as follows: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to redeem the Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, in gold, and to coin the silver now held for their redemption into subsidiary coin, the limit on the amount of subsidiary coin being expressly removed by the bill. The mode of disposing of the standard dollars is still more artful. The Secretary of the Treasury, whenever he deems it necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, may, in his discretion, exchange gold for any paper whatever, including silver certificates; in other words, he may buy up the silver certificates in circulation, and the bill provides that the certificates when so bought shall not be reissued or disposed of except in exchange for an amount of coin equivalent to the amount of coin which was expended in the purchase of the certificates—that is to say, they shall not be paid out except for an equivalent amount of gold coin.

In plain English, this artful provision authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to buy up and impound all silver certificates, which, of course, would impound the silver in the Treasury. Just what disposition he will make of the silver nobody knows, and yet nobody doubts. Everybody can see by the language of the act that neither the dollars nor the certificates will go into circulation, but will be impounded when they are bought with gold.

The act provides that as fast as the greenbacks are bought or paid into the Treasury they shall not be withdrawn except for gold coin, and thus Sherman notes, silver certificates, and the dollars in which they are redeemable, together with the greenbacks, are all to be disposed of under this bill and replaced by money upon which the Government, as before shown, will pay 3 per cent.

The Senate bill accomplishes everything by a most comprehensive scheme. It provides for the creation of an unlimited bonded debt and the refunding of all existing debts, and makes all the obligations of the United States payable in gold alone, and thus robs all other money, of every name and description, of its legal-tender power. It is also made the duty of the Secretary to sell bonds enough to maintain the parity of all kinds of money by redeeming everything in gold. If the people want a national debt ever increasing, without limit, and desire that the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase gold enough to pay interest thereon and enough more to redeem all other kinds of money and pay vast subsidies to the national banks, their desire for hard times must be insatiable. The people must decide whether the power conferred upon the National Government to create money shall be transferred to grasping syndicates to be used to deprive them of their property and eventually their liberty, or whether they will have a sufficient volume of legal-tender money issued by the Government to maintain stability of prices, and have such money covered into the Treasury and paid out for current expenses to relieve overburdened taxpayers.

The passage of this bill, whatever may have been the intention of its authors, will bring this question squarely before the American people. If this bill shall become a law, there will be no dodging the issue. It must be met, and that issue will be between a government by a colossal and imperial concentration of capital, wielding the sovereign power of the United States to create, contract, and expand the volume of money, and an honest measure of value consisting of the legal-tender money of the United States. Can anybody doubt what that choice will be? I advise the banks, the moneyed institutions of the land, and good citizens every where to pause before they sanction this legislation which must create financial despotism, revolution, or anarchy. It will settle nothing, but will provoke agitation to right the wrongs it will inflict, and if this bill shall become a law, the good old proverb that there is no peace for the wicked will be verified, and that beautiful sentiment expressed in the Swiss address to the Government of the United States, that "unsettled questions have no pity for the repose of mankind," will be realized.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President—

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Montana to yield to me just a moment.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. At this stage of the debate, without intending to discuss the pending bill, I ask that there may be inserted in the RECORD the amount of coinage of gold and silver of the mints of the world for the calendar years since 1873, including 1898.

Mr. TELLER. Not including 1899?

Mr. ALLISON. Eighteen hundred and ninety-nine is not included. I take the calendar year 1898. I quote from the last report of the Director of the Mint, page 50:

The total value of gold coined during these years amounts to $4,604,801,321.

Mr. COCKRELL. During what period?

Mr. ALLISON. During the period from 1873 to 1898, inclusive.

Mr. TELLER. By years?

Mr. ALLISON. The calendar years, giving each calendar year.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the production?

Mr. TELLER. The coinage.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the coinage of gold.

The coinage of silver during the same period amounts to $3,359,000,625. I ask that this table may be inserted in the RECORD. It is very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that a table to which he calls attention may be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know for what purpose the Senator from Montana rises—whether he purposes to discuss the pending bill or not.

Mr. CARTER. I rose for the purpose of calling up at this time Senate bill 2179.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is a bill already before the Senate. I wish to have some understanding in regard to that measure before anything else is called up. I should like to ask whether any Senator is ready to go on with the discussion of the pending bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand that there is no one on this side of the Senate Chamber ready to proceed with its discussion at this time. Senators have been very much engaged with other matters. While I know of a number of Senators who intend to submit some remarks on the bill before the vote is taken, a number of them have said to me that it has been impossible for them to be ready at this time to proceed with the discussion, but they hope to be ready very soon. I assure the Senator, as I did the other day, that there is no disposition on this side to delay the bill; but the personal convenience of Senators, it seems, requires that some of them, at any rate, should have some more time in which to prepare for the discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg to remind Senators that this bill was reported to the Senate three weeks ago, that more than a week has elapsed since the bill was taken up for actual consideration, and that up to this time we have had no speeches on the subject by Senators sitting on the other side of the Chamber.

While I have said repeatedly that I did not expect to object to discussion, and that we would be glad to have the fullest and freest discussion, I think I have a right to ask that that discussion shall take place within some reasonable time. With a desire, which I believe is shared by almost every Senator sitting upon either side of the Chamber, to reach a conclusion upon this subject at as early a day as possible, I feel it my duty to give notice that I shall ask to have this bill taken up on Monday. If there are no Senators ready to discuss it, I shall ask the Senate to vote upon it; and if there is anyone ready to discuss it, I shall ask to have the bill considered continuously until it shall be disposed of, and that without any desire to be unreasonable in my request; but this is a matter which it seems to me I must ask of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator complains that the bill has been before the Senate for a week since he made his speech. I wish to ask the Senator if there is to be any further discussion on the side of those who support the bill except what we have had?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know at the present time of anyone who desires to speak. So far as that is concerned, we are ready to vote on the bill at the present moment.

Mr. TELLER. We who are opposed to the bill and who propose to discuss it—as the Senator from Arkansas says, without any intention to delay it unnecessarily—had a right to suppose that the bill, which presents so grave a question, one that has been so much controverted, would at least have more than one defender on this floor. If the bill is to be submitted without any debate on the other side except what we have had, it will be the most extraordinary thing that has ever happened in legislation in any free country.

Of course I know that this is a caucus bill, but I did not suppose that it was a caucus bill to the extent that the whole defense of the bill was left to the chairman of the Committee on Finance. However, if that is the case, we will get ready for this debate. I should have been ready for it before, but I had every reason to suppose that somebody besides the chairman—some member of the committee, some one who sees so much beauty in this system—would at least take up the question and do what the Senator did not do, except in part—present to us the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Colorado is mistaken in his view of the substitute. In the first place, this is not a caucus bill.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say that the bill before the Senate properly, the one to be considered, under the suggestion made by the Senator who just left the floor, as all who know something of practical legislation are aware, is the bill that came from the House. That is first to be discussed, although the substitute of the Senate committee takes its place. When we allowed the Senator to put in the Senate bill for convenience, so that amendments might be made to it, he did not understand, I hope, that he would cut us off from debating the House bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not in the slightest.

Mr. TELLER. That is the bill that some of us at least are going to address ourselves to, not but that practically the bills are the same, but there are some features which are different in the bill as it came from the House, which I understand is a caucus measure, although I do not think it is hardly just to say that it is the result of a caucus of the Republican party, because it is not. It was the result of a caucus of some outside, intermeddling people, who thought they knew more about finance than anybody else in the world, and who induced a small percentage of the Republican members to adopt it as their work.

But we know very well, Mr. President, that when this bill passes, if it passes with the Senate amendment and goes into conference, we are practically cut off from any further debate and amendment, and that we shall have to take the bill as it is. So far as I am concerned, I want to make some objection not only to the Senate bill, but to the House bill, upon the theory suggested by the Senator from Nevada a few moments ago, which is in absolute accordance with the practice in the Senate that has been so viciously followed. I will instance, if anybody wants an illustration, the Sherman Act of 1890, a bill that was forced upon the silver people of this country, which, as I myself said, thirty minutes before I voted for it, was absolutely indefensible as a money measure, and was only put upon us to prevent the passage of a free coinage bill and the necessity of a Republican President vetoing it, which he had declared over and over again he would do if it came to him.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I do not undertake to deny the right of the Senator from Colorado or any other Senator to discuss in any of its phases either the House bill or Senate bill; but I have suggested that if it is to be discussed that discussion ought to be had. I assume there is no obligation on our part to do anything more than to present the bill and to furnish with it the explanations which those who are responsible for the measure think are necessary for the information of the Senate.

I did not undertake to defend the bill, because the bill needs no defense from my hands or anybody else. The merits speak for themselves. I simply undertook to explain its provisions. Those provisions up to this moment have not been criticised by anybody upon the Democratic side of this Chamber and by no Senator except the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], who sits upon this side. The customary course of discussion, of course, is that some Senator representing the minority on the committee shall undertake to discuss the bill and give his reasons why it should not be adopted. That, up to this moment, has not been done, and I am simply trying to impress upon the Senate now that I feel it to be my duty next week, when the bill shall come up again, to try to secure either discussion or a vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. You will have some discussion.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say one word further, Mr. President. I have not felt myself under obligation to commence the debate against the bill (although I am intending to debate it), because I think there is great force in what the chairman of the committee says, that the acknowledged minority of this body perhaps, who we know are not in accord with the bill, ought to attack the measure. I am in absolute sympathy with them in their attack against it. In the orderly way in which we are doing business here I suppose it is perhaps to be expected that they will commence the opposition to it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator in charge of this bill reminded the Senate that the bill had been reported to the Senate three weeks ago, but he did not remind the Senate that on the very day after his report was made the Senate took a recess for two whole weeks. Many Senators were out of the city and were not in a position to take up public business, and when they returned a number of matters were before the Senate for consideration. Bills have been taken up here for discussion, and the morning hour has been taken up in the discussion of matters of general and public interest.

Senators on this side did not consider themselves called on to lay aside every other question in which they felt a public interest for the purpose of preparing for this debate. I do not think there has been any such delay on this side of the Chamber as to call for any criticism, and none of which the Senator from Rhode Island can very materially complain. I have assured him that there is no intention on this side to delay the consideration of the bill or to delay a vote. It shall be had at an early date. There will be no disposition to prevent that; there is none whatever, and has been none; but gentlemen on this side who desire to submit arguments against the bill to show its unwisdom or the reasons why it ought not to pass need some time, in connection with other public duties which they have, to present their views in as clear, distinct, and concise a way as possible.

I hope there will be, I am sure, in fact, there will be gentlemen ready to take up the discussion on Monday next, and that there will be a number of gentlemen ready in the near future to proceed with the discussion. I hope there will be no disposition on the part of the Senator in charge of the bill, as I am satisfied there will not be, to prevent any fair discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the pending bill be postponed as the unfinished business until Monday at 2 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.
The motion was agreed to.

TWELFTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for the present consideration of Senate bill 2179.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall try to get an opportunity this afternoon for a vote on the resolution of inquiry, upon the terms of which my colleague and myself have agreed. I hope it may be adopted without objection. I give notice of that purpose now.

Mr. CARTER. I believe the census bill can be very promptly disposed of, I will state to the Senator. It is a matter of an urgent nature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CULLOM to insert at the end of section 2, on page 3, the following proviso:

Provided, That the Director of the Census may, in his discretion, collect statistics relating to all the deaf, dumb, and blind, notwithstanding the restriction in this section relating to special classes.

Mr. CARTER. I have been authorized by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to withdraw that amendment in his absence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question, not being familiar with the discussion which has been had so far. Is there any provision in the bill under which the census authorities would have an opportunity to take any statistics with reference to deaf-mutes?

Mr. CARTER. There is in section 8 of the bill a provision looking to that class of inquiries, and there exists an understanding that certain restrictions in section 8 will be removed when the time arrives for the active operations under and in conformity with the provision of that section.

Mr. BACON. The reason why I make the inquiry is because I have had a communication on the subject from an institution for deaf-mutes. I do not wish to offer any amendment if I have the assurance that the bill as it stands is sufficiently elastic to permit of such an enumeration and of such statistics as may be desired relative to that class of people.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] had an amendment pending, and discussed it at some length, and, in view of the arrangement made for some future action with reference to that subject, he authorized me to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any harm in inquiring of the Senator what is that arrangement for future action?

Mr. CARTER. The desire of the Senator from Illinois was to amend section 8, which, for the time being, is an inactive section of the bill. It is provided that work under section 8 shall not be commenced until after the completion of the decennial census. The work can not be commenced under that section until an appropriation is made for that purpose. The work can not be commenced until Congress directs that the Census Bureau shall take up the subjects-matter embraced in section 8. Now, the objection to the present language of that section by the Senator from Illinois and those concerned in the subject to which he addressed himself, and to which his amendment relates, was that it confines inquiries as to special classes to those in institutions.

Mr. HOAR. I understand all that very thoroughly, but I want to know what is the remedy proposed.

Mr. CARTER. Not desiring to encumber the present bill, which relates to administrative work exclusively and is emergency work in its character, I have suggested to the Senator from Illinois, on the assurance of members of the Census Committee, that when work is to be taken up under section 8 we will favor his amendment to that section, removing all restrictions with reference to inquiries as to the deaf, dumb, and blind.

Mr. HOAR. I want to present a like consideration in regard to mine. I think that possibly the direction in the existing law to get the statistics of manufactures would authorize the statistics of manufacturing power, but I suppose a lawyer—I give that as an illustration of the whole point—would hold that the special enumeration of one, of electric power, is an omission of the rest, and that one power being mentioned in the section it would be held that that did not include water power.

I do not suppose there is anybody, certainly no business man, no manufacturer, no lawyer, who would question the importance of those statistics. Early in this very year I was counsel in an important controversy where there were some eighteen cases involving millions of dollars claims for damages, an entire stream having been taken by a city for the water power, and I was surprised to find how imperfect were the statistics as to the water power of the country and their large worth.

There is a paper on the statistics of water power in the last census, as the Senator will recollect. The gentleman who prepared the paper himself admitted the imperfect material he had for it. I have been very strongly urged to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate by the gentlemen who were engaged in compiling those statistics the last time. There is some statistical matter, and a great deal in regard to my own State, because we have had every alternate five years a State census. The material for this compilation very largely exists in the great national Survey, the Geological Survey, where, of course, the configuration of the earth's surface is very exactly measured and recorded now all over the country. So it will not be a very expensive affair to get the material, and I hope the Senator will give me the same assurance which I understand him to have given the Senator from Illinois. I may say that the amendment which I offer has been approved by the honorable Senator from Maine and by the honorable Senator himself as a good thing in itself. If they can give me the same assurance that they have the Senator from Illinois about my amendment, I will not detain the bill by debating it as an amendment here.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Massachusetts correctly states that the Senator from Maine, as well as the chairman of the committee, approved of an inquiry directed to the ascertainment of the information contemplated by his amendment; and in so far as personal assurance goes, I can state to the Senator that our votes on the committee of the Senate favor that amendment to the bill at the proper time.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to have the amendment moved now and printed for the information of the Senate, and then I will withdraw it on that assurance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts presents an amendment. Does the Senator desire to have it read?

Mr. HOAR. Let it go into the RECORD. I do not care about its being read. I move it as an amendment to the bill. I want it stated from the Chair that it is moved as an amendment. Then I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. HOAR. It will be printed in the RECORD. It is not necessary to read it.

The amendment presented by Mr. HOAR is to add the following:

That, in addition to the statistics enumerated in the eighth section of an act to provide for the taking of the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, approved March 3, 1890, the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, directed to collect statistics of the water power of the country.

Mr. HOAR. Now, I withdraw the amendment on the understanding of the chairman of the committee that in his opinion the committee will report favorably upon it as an independent matter when the proper time in the future shall arise.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not understand that that kind of a bargain is going around the Senate. I do not understand that the chairman pledges the committee to vote for anything. As I understood the words of the Senator, he said that the committee gave assurance that the committee would vote to adopt the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator did not understand me correctly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I beg pardon.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misunderstood my statement.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand the assurance was that in consideration if the Senator would not press the amendment at this time the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Maine on the committee would vote for the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. That is very different.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If there is to be any further bargain, I should like to know it.

Mr. HOAR. That is very different from what the Senator said first.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is very different from what I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say anything of the kind. I said on the assurance of the Senator from Montana that in his opinion it would be favorably considered when the time came, I would not press the amendment now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But I did not understand the Senator from Montana to present so flowery a view of his committee as that. I did not understand him to say that in his opinion his committee would join with himself and the Senator from Maine in voting for the amendment. He only went so far as to pledge his own vote and the vote of the Senator from Maine, and if it went further than that I should like to have the RECORD to show it.

Mr. HOAR. I will ask the Senator from Montana if it is not his opinion that the committee will be likely—I understand he does not pledge anybody—to consider the amendment favorably?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have it read, if I can have it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the statement was—I repeat it as it was—that I understood the fact to be that the Senator from Maine had precisely, as represented by the Senator from Massachusetts, examined this proposed amendment, was favorable to it, his only objection to the amendment being its incorporation into this bill, such action being calculated to encumber the work of the census. That is my own position. The amendment is a simple one. There is no reasonable probability of any radical change of opinion concerning it. I have no doubt that the amendment will commend itself when presented at the proper time to the Senate and that it will become a part of the law. I merely express that opinion.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have been trying to further the interests of wise legislation. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that the Senator from Montana now very carefully disavows any expression of opinion as to how anybody will vote on this bill in committee except himself and the Senator from Maine, whom he feels authorized to pledge.

Mr. HOAR. And he adds the opinion that he thinks the entire Senate will favor it when it comes up. I trust my very lively friend from Colorado will admit that that includes the proposition I stated.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the anxiety of the committee to have this bill acted upon promptly is based upon the considerations set forth very briefly in a letter just received from the Director of the Census. I appreciate the consideration of Senators in withdrawing amendments calculated to lead to protracted discussion.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CARTER. I wish, for the information of the Senate, to have this letter read from the Secretary's desk, whereupon I will cheerfully yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter referred to by the Senator from Montana.

This Secretary read as follows:

CENSUS OFFICE, OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1900.

DEAR SENATOR CARTER: I beg to hand you herewith samples of the schedules, now either in print or delivered at this office, that will be used in the coming enumeration. You will observe that there are altogether over 10,000,000 of these schedules. To make any change in their form would delay the work in such a way as to make it practically impossible to carry out the present law. These schedules will be packed for shipment during the coming month, and, in many cases, will be sent to the supervisors before the 1st of March. I sincerely trust that there will be no additions to the present law that will in any way interfere with the prompt delivery to the supervisors of the country of the schedules in the form herein indicated. The amendments that have been suggested through your committee are purely administrative in character and necessary for the work and efficient carrying out of the present act. I hope you will call the attention of the Senate to this, in order that there may be no delay.

Truly, yours,

W. R. MERRIAM, Director.

HON. THOMAS H. CARTER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CARTER. I now yield with pleasure to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to make a suggestion in regard to this bill to the Senator from Wisconsin, to which I think he will agree. I suppose I am not alone in having a desire to amend the bill, but I deferred proposing an amendment because of the urgency with which the Senator from Montana pressed its passage without amendment. I am taken, as I suppose other Senators are, somewhat by surprise by the proceedings here to-day.

If I had known what was to happen, I should have offered my amendment yesterday and secured on the record here a stipulation from the Senator to-day as the price of my withdrawal of it. Now, I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be entirely agreeable to him and altogether fair to let this go over until Monday next, in order that those of us who desire to advantage ourselves in the interest of the general public in this arrangement should have an opportunity to prepare our amendments, to offer them, and to secure on the record a stipulation in regard to them similar to that which has been arranged with certain other Senators.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that the pledge is only made on the part of the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not dispute that.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator if he thinks the arrangement is of sufficient importance to justify waiting over until Monday?

Mr. SPOONER. The arrangement being confined to the Senator from Montana, I am inclined to say I do not. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, as section 3, the following:

SEC. 3. That the Director of the Census is hereby required to collect statistics relating to the indebtedness of individuals and corporations, public or private; also in relation to the distribution of wealth among the people of the United States; also statistics as to the displacement of labor by machinery, and the increase of the power of production by machinery in proportion to the number of laborers employed during the last thirty years. And for this purpose the Director of the Census may employ special agents, and such special agents shall receive such compensation as other special agents.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, this amendment is intended to secure statistics with regard to the distribution of wealth. It does not require the enumerators to gather the statistics on this subject, and therefore will not delay the purpose of the law which we have passed.

We make the Census Bureau, as I understand, a perpetual bureau of statistics and information, and to fail to gather the information referred to in my amendment, it seems to me, would be a very serious mistake. The question as to what becomes of what the toilers of this land produce, whether it goes to them or is taken from them by special privileges and accumulated in the hands of a very few people is a very important one and reaches ultimately the question of the preservation of free institutions.

The other subject in my amendment is with regard to the displacement of labor by machinery and the increased power of man's production thereby. I desire this information for the reason that I believe man's power to produce as the result of the adoption of machinery has increased many times more than the increase of his wages, which should have occurred as a result of his increased power of production; in other words, that the increased power of production as the result of machinery has inured to the advantage of capital many times more than to the advantage of labor; that this has caused in a large degree the unequal distribution of wealth in this country; that the increased power of production as the result of machinery should go to the toiler in a much larger degree than to the capital employed; that the power to produce by machinery is a benefit to mankind if the increased power to produce goes to the toiler, because his power to consume is also increased, and thus the consumption and enjoyment of a greater measure of the luxuries and comforts of life must go to those who produce the wealth of the land.

I therefore believe these two questions are exceedingly important; and I have asked that this information be collected by special agents rather than by the enumerators, so that it will not delay a single day or a single hour the securing of that information which seems to be the prime object of the bill.

I hope the additional section I have offered will be adopted without objection.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be adopted at this time. It will come under the supplemental work provided to be performed after the conclusion of the present census; and inasmuch as the subject-matter is of the character specified by the Senator and should be performed by special agents, it is not necessary that it should be entered upon at this time, as it would seriously encumber this bill.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana how it would injure this bill? It does not seem to me that it can interfere with the purpose of getting the statistics of population or anything of that kind.

Mr. CARTER. It interferes with the bill in that it would begin at this time to provide for additional work to be performed and information to be obtained with the taking of the decennial census. Any additional task imposed after the schedules have been printed and prepared for shipment, as they are, involves the printing and preparation of other schedules, which must be perforce distributed to special agents, supervisors, or enumerators, and it is now quite obvious that after millions of these schedules have been printed—

Mr. PETTIGREW. My amendment does not interfere with that at all. It will not require anything to be done now.

Mr. CARTER. It will require additional printing in connection with the census, which is now prepared to be performed in an expeditious manner; and we think that, inasmuch as this work can be done through special agents, it ought to be confined to section 8 of the act, which provides for the performance of certain work after the completion of the census.

Mr. TELLER. I do not see how this amendment, if adopted, will in the slightest degree interfere, because the proposed work is not to be done by the enumerators, it is not to be done by the people who are going to receive those schedules, but by an entirely different force, as I understand the amendment; at least, it ought to be done in that way. It ought not to interfere with the enumerators. It seems to me it would be wise to place the amendment on the bill and let the Director of the Census know what he is to expect, so that he may get ready to enlarge his work; and this proposition, as I say, is separate and distinct.

He will want an entirely different schedule for it from that which he has prepared. I do not myself wish to put anything in the bill which will retard getting out the population statistics and some other statistics of that kind, although I think the information desired by the Senator from South Dakota is much more important than even that of collecting the statistics of population. The Treasury Department gives us every month an estimate of population, and I have no doubt we know within probably a million what population we have now.

But the information designed to be secured by the amendment can only be collected by a class of high-grade people. Such work can not be done by the common man who goes and enumerates the people in his community. It can only be done by men of education and good judgment; and when the information shall be gathered it will be the most valuable we shall secure in the whole line of statistics.

The subject involved in the amendment is one very much discussed and very much mooted throughout the world; and yet no real data have been collected that I know of in any country which would entirely satisfy the desire for such information. I believe the adoption of this amendment would secure it. I should like to see the amendment adopted, and adopted early enough so that the work can be done, and we can get the result of it not at the same time with the population statistics, but afterwards.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, to that particular suggestion there can be no reasonable objection, but each of the persons interested in various special subjects considers the special subject attracting his attention as of the most vital and overwhelming importance.

Mr. TELLER. Let us keep the others off and keep this on.

Mr. CARTER. We have in section 8 of the law provided for the collation of statistics, after the completion and return of the enumeration, on the following subjects:

Statistics relating to special classes, including the insane, feeble-minded, deaf, dumb, and blind; to crime, pauperism, and benevolence, including prisoners, paupers, juvenile delinquents, and inmates of benevolent and reformatory institutions; to deaths and births in registration areas; to social statistics of cities; to public indebtedness, valuation, taxation, and expenditures; to religious bodies; to electric light and power, telephone and telegraph business; to transportation by water, express business, and street railways; to mines, mining and minerals, and the production and value thereof, including gold, in divisions of placer and vein, and silver mines, and the number of men employed, the average daily wage, average working time, and aggregate earnings in the various branches and aforesaid divisions of the mining industry.

And a line of other productions. All of these were embraced in the Eleventh Census, and the incorporation of these mighty details into that census made the census such a ponderous work that its results were not known for eight or nine long years after the enumeration. It is that unfortunate situation we desire to avoid at this time, and for the purpose of avoiding it the census work has been divided by the original act into two distinct parts—first, a decennial census confined within the narrow limits of population, agriculture, manufactures, and vital statistics, and there we stopped.

We provide for the continuation of this line of investigation, though after the enumeration shall have been completed, and thereupon for these other subjects in which the people are interested, in which legislators are interested, humanitarians, and people in all the walks of human thought and endeavor, if you please, each feeling that the thing which has engrossed his attention is of more vital importance than all the other things put together.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him right there at what time is it anticipated this special work will be begun? In other words, what I desire to know is this: The Senator has suggested that by subsequent amendment to the bill whatever defects there may be regarding enumeration upon such particular subjects as Senators desire may be subsequently corrected by amendment. The point of my inquiry is whether the subsequent enumeration on these special matters will probably be begun before or after the next session of Congress? The Senator will see the purpose of the inquiry. If this inquiry can not be begun before then, of course whatever amendments ought to be made should be made now.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that no investigation can be commenced on this supplemental work until Congress shall have appropriated the money for that purpose. Not one farthing has been appropriated, and no money will be appropriated at this session for this additional work, in all human probability.

I have suggested to Senators having in view inquiries upon supplemental topics that when the appropriation is made to conduct inquiries under this section will be the time to incorporate amendments directing the particular subjects upon which investigation shall be prosecuted.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question so as to see if I understood him. Does the Senator mean to say that no appropriation will be made at this session of Congress for this specific work?

Mr. CARTER. I doubt whether any will be made for this supplemental work.

Mr. TELLER. Why not?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know as to that, but the probabilities are that the regular census work will not be completed until Congress convenes in December next.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But the amendment I have offered provides that the special work referred to shall be delayed until after the completion of the returns of the enumerators and the work upon the schedules relative to agriculture, manufactures, and mechanical establishments.

Mr. CARTER. As a practical proposition in that particular it is known that the force which will carry out this supplemental work will not be through with the work of tabulating the schedules of the decennial census until probably the 1st of next January, and there will then be ample time to make the appropriations for this supplemental work.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to ask the Senator if it is proposed to enumerate the industrial combinations of the United States and their effect upon the industrial classes? Perhaps I do not make myself as fully understood as I should. What I mean is, whether there is any intention to make a distinct enumeration of the trusts and combinations, their capitalization, their actual capital, their influence upon the industrial classes, and so on and so forth?

Mr. CARTER. I refer the Senator for an answer to the seventh section of the act. The first part of that section provides what the Twelfth Census shall be.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator be kind enough to read it? I have not a copy of it before me.

Mr. CARTER. The seventh section provides:

That the Twelfth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to the population, to mortality, to the products of agriculture and of manufacturing and mechanical establishments.

Then there is a definition of what the population schedules shall apply to.

Mr. TELLER. That is the bill at present before the Senate, is it not?

Mr. CARTER. I am reading from the present law. The bill before the Senate is one wherein certain administrative features of that law are corrected and provided for.

Mr. TELLER. The act provides, then, for a very limited examination?

Mr. BACON. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Montana. I understand the objection urged by the Senator from Montana to the proposed amendment is that millions of copies of the schedules for the taking of the census will be practically useless or will have to be changed in order to conform to such requirements as amendments may place upon the census work. The question I want to ask the Senator is this: Do the schedules concerning which the letter from the Director of the Census has been read embrace anything more than the subjects-matter which the Senator mentions as the subjects for quick enumeration?

Mr. CARTER. They do not.

Mr. BACON. That is the very point as to which I desire information. If they do not, then of course these amendments can not in any manner affect those schedules, because, as the Senator states, the enumeration with reference to population, manufactures, agriculture, and vital statistics are to be begun immediately, and the schedules have been prepared for them. The other work which will be attended to under these proposed amendments is not to be done on those schedules at all, but upon altogether different schedules. Therefore the argument, it seems to me, as presented by the Senator is not forceful.

Mr. CARTER. The argument presented by the Senator from Georgia is upon a mistaken notion of the facts.

Mr. BACON. I was asking the Senator as to the facts before I proceeded.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator had heard read the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], he would have perceived that the amendment contemplates the addition to the decennial census work of inquiries on particular subjects—not waiting until after the completion of the enumeration. The same was true with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], relating to the deaf, dumb, and blind. He contemplates an inquiry upon that subject contemporaneous with the taking of the decennial census, which would involve the printing of separate schedules, which would have to be forwarded to the supervisors. To print those schedules would cause great delay, and the enumerators would be encumbered with additional work. The addition of any amendment is only unfortunate on account of the work it would entail by inaugurating a policy of legislation which would probably result ultimately in altogether breaking down this census.

I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] that we have restricted the census to narrow limits in confining it to population, manufactures, agriculture, and vital statistics; but a line of demarcation had to be drawn somewhere in order to have this work completed within any reasonable time, and the line was drawn there, the rule of action being to confine the census to such subjects only as could be intelligently investigated by a house-to-house canvass. Any matter that could be investigated through special agents or by correspondence was left out of the decennial census work.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I think I can throw a little light on the subject in which the Senator from Georgia is interested, in regard to the deaf, dumb, and blind. After the population schedule, as outlined in section 7, shall have been completed—in other words, after the enumerator has taken the population in accordance with the requirements of section 7—section 8 provides:

That after the completion and return of the enumeration and of the work upon the schedules relating to the products of agriculture and to manufacturing and mechanical establishments provided for in section 7 of this act, the Director of the Census is hereby authorized to collect statistics relating to special classes, including the insane, feeble-minded, deaf, dumb, and blind; to crime, pauperism, and benevolence, including prisoners, paupers, juvenile delinquents, and inmates of benevolent and reformatory institutions; to deaths and births in registration areas; to social statistics of cities; to public indebtedness, valuation, taxation, and expenditures, etc.

There is a very vast field to be covered by this special work to be done after the first census, as it has been termed, has been completed. But there is a condition which limits the tabulation of the deaf, dumb, and blind to those who are in institutions.

Mr. BACON. That is true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Therefore the deaf, dumb, and blind population scattered throughout the country in private families, of whatever age or condition, are not to be enumerated in the census, and there is no means of arriving at the number of persons of that character.

Mr. BACON. It is to cure that defect that I desire to have the amendment put in the original law. If the Senator from Montana will pardon me a moment, there is already pending the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That has been withdrawn.

Mr. BACON. It is stated that that amendment has been withdrawn. I was about to read it for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that it does not in any manner, so far as I am able to judge of it, complicate or interfere with the taking of the quick census. If it is practicable to do what the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has criticised, to have an agreement to the effect that this subject will be attended to on the appropriation bill, it will be all right. I do not wish to embarrass the present bill, but I do not see how the amendment would do so, for the reason that it expressly provides this work shall be done after the enumeration in which the quick census is to be taken.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will say for the information of the Senator from Georgia that if it is not taken with the first census it can not be taken at all without an intolerable additional expense. It is for the Senate to determine whether it will enlarge the scope of the census. If we break down the barrier erected by the Census Committee, we simply, as we were notified by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] the other day, open up a flood of amendments concerning each special class of inquiry any Senator may wish to have included.

Mr. PETTIGREW. My amendment provides for nothing of the kind. It simply provides that this Census Bureau of statistics, which is perpetual, may by special agents, not by enumerators, investigate this all-important subject. I think the census would be of very little value without it. It is not personal to myself, nor a subject that I am particularly or personally interested in, but it is a great public question. The question of the distribution of the wealth of this country is certainly a question of more importance than almost anything else that can be investigated. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has said, we have almost day by day a very accurate estimate of the population. We have very many other statistics which are constantly being produced by the statistical bureau, but the question of the distribution of the wealth of this country has never been adequately and fairly investigated. It ought to be.

I do not propose to delay the taking of the census, and my amendment does not delay it at all. It simply provides an additional section for the doing of this additional work. If the schedules are all prepared and the work is disposed of, the enumerators can commence their operations; and therefore the Department will have the time to get out additional schedules for the special agents to do the work which I desire to have done. This work can not commence until an appropriation is made. It is quite proper, then, that the amendment should be on this bill, because section 8 is in the original law, which provides a large amount of extra work to be done after the main census has been taken through the enumerators; and if it was a proper time to provide section 8 in the law when we passed it last year, it is time now for my amendment to be placed on this bill. That is all I want. I do not care to discuss it further.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I should like to contribute a few words to this discussion. If I understand the matter, the present bill of the Committee on the Census relates purely to the administration work under section 7, and is necessary in order that that work may go on for the quick census, as it is called. Having presented a bill upon that subject, it happens that there are a good many Senators here who feel that the scope of section 8 ought to be enlarged. It seems to me that that is a matter for the committee to consider and to bring in for the consideration of the Senate hereafter.

It is perfectly apparent that if we are going to try to enlarge the scope of the work under the eighth section by the adoption of one amendment, this bill is not going to pass in that form after that amendment shall have been adopted, but all Senators who feel that the scope of the census should be enlarged are going to ask to have action delayed upon it until they can bring forward the particular measures which they think should be attended to in the enlargement of section 8.

Now, we are not going to pass any bill for the perfection of the administration of the census if this policy is pursued. It seems to me that the way to do is for the person who wants the census enlarged to present amendments to that bill and refer them to the committee and have the committee consider them. It is evident it has got to be enlarged in some respects. Then let the committee consider all the questions as to the enlargement of the scope of that work and present them all together to the Senate. Then if Senators are not satisfied, of course that bill will be a proper one to amend by the introduction of other topics. But it does seem to me we ought to pass this bill now and not complicate it with these other questions.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to say simply one word, and that is that section 2 of this bill does enlarge the scope of the census as provided for in the original act.

Mr. BACON. I wish to call the attention of Senators, and particularly of Senators on the committee, to one consideration which, it seems to me, takes this particular subject-matter, in which I have some interest, out of the possibility of its being included in the suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut.

The suggestion which I wish to make is that the enumeration as to the deaf, dumb, and blind can not be made at any time except when the enumeration of population is made, except at a very great expense, which would require a canvass from house to house, just in the same way that the canvass is made for the purpose of ascertaining the number of people.

There are a great many matters which can be investigated and statistics collected relative thereto which are not subject to this particular requirement, and therefore it is either now or never. It seems to me practical. If I am wrong, I should like to be corrected by the committee. If there is a way in which it can be done subsequently, of course I have no desire to embarrass the committee by doing that which they do not wish.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Georgia, I desire to state that all this matter has been before the Committee on Census, and it was thoroughly considered. It was then decided to be not best to embody it in this amendment of the law, for the reason that the enumerators appointed throughout the country are not the class of people who would be best fitted to investigate the question in which the Senator from Georgia is so much interested, and that by special agents hereafter appointed for that purpose, or it may be by getting in correspondence with the physicians throughout the country, better results would be reached than could be obtained by the enumerators who are not of the standard to go into the several households in their enumeration districts and ascertain this very important information.

Mr. BACON. I understand, then, and I call attention to it because we may have to refer to it hereafter, that it is the opinion of the Census Committee, after having investigated the question, that this subject-matter can be especially attended to hereafter—that it will be practical to do it?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir; that is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have an amendment which I wish to offer. I move to add as an additional section:

That in the event of the death of any supervisor or enumerator after his appointment and entrance on his duties, the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay his widow or legal representative such sum as may be just and fair for the services rendered by said supervisor or enumerator prior to his death.

Mr. CARTER. That amendment relates purely to an administrative matter and is entirely germane to the bill. I see no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I have an amendment very imperfectly drawn which I desire to present and which I hope will be amended and amount to something. I will read it, as no one could read it but myself. I desire to offer it as an amendment to section 2 of the bill on page 3 after line 23:

And provided further, That the Director of the Census shall also cause to be enumerated all industrial and other combinations known as trusts, their situs, the amount of their capitalization and the actual capital invested in them, their effect on the laborers and consumers of the country; and he shall also gather and tabulate all other information with reference to them necessary to an understanding of their character and effect on the Government.

That, I admit, is rather crude in its language, but I think it covers the case.

Mr. ALLISON. How does the Senator propose to have the work done?

Mr. ALLEN. Let it be done by special agents. I do not care how it is done so it is taken up as a distinct branch and the country furnished with full and accurate information on the subject. I do not want to delay the passage of the bill nor discuss its merits after 4 o'clock, but this matter seems to have been entirely overlooked.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to state for the Senator's information, if he will permit me—

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. The present law the Senator will find in Public Act No. 183, and section 7 provides as follows:

The schedules of inquiries relating to the products of manufacturing and mechanical establishments shall embrace the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, cooperative, or other form; date of commencement of operations; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners, or officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees, and the amount of their wages; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; amount of miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time in operation during the census year; character and quantity of power used, and character and number of machines employed. The form and subdivision of inquiries necessary to secure the information under the foregoing topics relating to manufacturing and mechanical industries shall be in the discretion of the Director of the Census.

I suggest to the Senator that these inquiries will, I think, fairly cover the matter contemplated by his proposed amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. If I thought so I would not offer this amendment. The inquiries called for by the section just read by the Senator from Montana, in my humble judgment, call for nothing more than what may be called the legitimate manufacturing and industrial interests of the country. A trust, if I am correctly informed, is a combination. It is an association of corporations intended and calculated to control the particular output which it undertakes to produce, to fix its price, to regulate the price of labor, and all matters pertaining to that particular branch of industry. What the Senator has read does not cover the question of these trusts.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to call the Senator's attention to one matter. I am very much interested in his proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ALLEN. Always, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. Do not the words "character of organization, whether individual, cooperative, or other form" include, in part at least, what the Senator wishes to reach?

Mr. ALLEN. I should think not; at least it is capable of a double construction. What I want to see, Mr. President, is a distinct enumeration of the numerous trusts of this country. I would like to have the Director of the Census go further, and find out the percentage of increase, showing when they started. Certainly it is important to the country, and it is daily growing more important, that the people should be informed of the influence of these trusts and combinations upon the Government itself.

This is not a question that any Republican or Democrat or Populist should shrink from. It is a question that every man, regardless of his political opinions, should be willing to have brought to the surface and have full information obtained upon it, for I feel confident, Mr. President, that however much we may disagree respecting measures and policies affecting the country (and we do disagree, and we disagree irreconcilably), yet we can not disagree upon any question which the people, or any respectable portion of the people, believe is sapping the life and the vitality of the Government itself. There we reach the plane of patriotism where we must all stand in favor of the Government.

Now, I do not understand that it is the purpose of the act which has been passed to enumerate these trusts as separate institutions, to compile the information under a distinct head, necessary to a clear understanding of them. It ought to be so simple and so plain that the commonest reader could understand it. It ought not to be scattered through five or six large volumes or more. It ought not to be in such a form that those who desire to know what the truth may be respecting these institutions shall be compelled to search through the volumes of the census, when they are published, to ascertain what the facts may be.

It is strange to me that a subject so important as this should escape the attention of Congress. These combinations, Mr. President, are the subject of delay and agitation in the press of the country and among the people, and whatever we may say respecting the political views on any class of our people, whether we agree with them or disagree, we certainly can not afford to treat them with disrespect, and we can not afford to deny them the information to which they are entitled.

The money that pays for this census, Mr. President, comes from the taxpayers of the country, the rich and the poor alike. There is no distinction; every man pays according to his ability. If any class of our people desire to know whether these gigantic financial and industrial institutions are threatening the life of the nation, they ought to be permitted to know that, and there ought to be no disagreement between us here respecting it.

Mr. President, I would not insinuate that there is any purpose to escape this unpleasant duty by a misconstruction of the law already in force, but I can see that a man who is rather technical in the construction of language may say that that does not mean that there shall be a separate enumeration of all these institutions. It provides that they shall simply be classed as a part and parcel of the industrial institutions and enumerated under the separate and distinct heads to which the contributing corporations and organizations belong. That is not what I want. That is not, Mr. President, what I believe is necessary for the people for whose information all this mass is to be gathered.

I have no desire to talk longer on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. [Putting the question.] The yeas appear to have it. The yeas have it, and the amendment is lost.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment, if I can get it.

Mr. CARTER. I trust the Senator will not demand a yea-and-nay vote at this hour in the afternoon.

Mr. ALLEN. Why not? Mr. President, does the Senator propose to deny the country this information?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Nebraska I will state that his proposition is to pay a $3-a-day enumerator or a $600 clerk to pick out certain lines of business, without judicial inquiry or determination or day in court, and pronounce them trusts.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not propose anything of the kind.

Mr. CARTER. Nothing else on earth can be done with the proposition as presented by the amendment than to commission a clerk in the Census Office to denounce certain persons as conducting business under what is commonly denominated the organization of a trust. The proposition answers itself.

There are certain laws which have been passed, very strict, stringent, and drastic, denouncing trusts. These trusts, if trusts exist, have a right to their day in court before the criminal laws of the country can be applied to them. Every individual citizen of the United States, and every combination of capital, in whatsoever engaged, has a right to a fair hearing before being denounced and put in an odious position in the public prints. The amendment could not be executed at all.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I sympathize with his desire to get this information as thoroughly as possible, and I think it ought to be got under the present law. It requires the character of all corporations to be ascertained, which, I suppose, would mean, of course, their legal character—whether an association of individuals or of partners. But the question I wish to put to the Senator is, Who, under his amendment, is to deal with the very interesting and important question of the effect of each one of these organizations upon the public interest and welfare? He requires that to be stated. It would seem to me that that function should be committed to a committee of the Senate or to some such tribunal. It would hardly be a function that we would commit even to any of these enumerators or even to the one man who is the Director of the Census.

I wish to ask the Senator the meaning of that particular phrase, that there shall be in the census a report of the effect on the public welfare of a certain way of doing business.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall be glad to answer that in consecutive order as far as I am capable of doing as I proceed with what I was going to say.

The answer of the Senator from Montana is hardly satisfactory to me on this question. I think I know something about the force of language, and I think also that I know something about what it is to inquire into facts to determine their effect upon a given condition.

The Senator from Montana is altogether too much alarmed about some $600 enumerator condemning and stamping as criminals certain organizations. Mr. President, I am not here at this time to say whether these organizations are criminal or not. I have my opinion about it, but this is not the time to express it. I do not care whether the clerk draws $3 a day or $33 a day, if he gets the information. I do not care if you call him a clerk or an enumerator or a director or a judge, or what you may call him. Names count for nothing. It is the function that he performs that makes his services valuable or not valuable.

What is there about these industries that you can not get official information about them? The moment their name is mentioned or their interests are challenged in this Chamber that moment some gentleman stands on his feet to defeat any information respecting them. Of course he does not say in so many words "We do not want this information," but he finds some indirect and deft method of side tracking every measure that is calculated to bring out the desired knowledge.

There is no purpose, as I understand it, and I think the Senator from Montana impliedly, at least, confesses it, of classifying these institutions and enumerating them or of determining fully, or as fully as can be, their effect upon the institutions of our country. I come to that now to answer the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, when you ascertain the information respecting the wealth of the people of this country you ascertain valuable information upon the subject of its effect upon the country. The wealth of the people has all to do with that people. When you find out the per capita wealth of the country, you ascertain valuable information respecting the influences that bear upon the destiny of that country. When you gather this information, if it can be gathered, concerning these great and gigantic institutions and what they have done, if they have done anything, respecting the policies of the nation, respecting political parties, their success or their defeat, you ascertain valuable information that bears upon their influence upon the country.

As I said, Mr. President, I do not desire at this late hour to delay this bill. I have no more interest in it than any other Senator. I have as much; my people have as much. I dare say that among the people of the great State which I have the honor in part to represent in this Chamber there can not be found even a Republican—not one, and there are many strict party men there—who would deny the right of the people to this information, and who would not wish that some steps might be taken to gather it.

What subtle influences do these great organizations possess that you can not stand in the Senate of the United States and obtain proper information respecting their capitalization and respecting their influence upon the country? There seems to be some hidden power that is exercised over Congress respecting this matter. Have we come to that period, Mr. President, in the history of our splendid country when we dare not inquire into those organizations and those influences that affect it for its well-being, for weal or for woe?

This information hurts no person and no class of persons. It is highly important, and it strikes me that it is highly patriotic, for Congress to take some steps that will provide it for the benefit of the country.

I do not want to delay the Senator from Montana, but I should like to see an expression of the Senate on the subject. I should like to see gentlemen go upon record who say that this information is not valuable. Yet I realize that possibly a vote of that kind might disclose an unpleasant situation at the present moment, and therefore I do not desire to do that. But I suggest to the Senator from Montana to permit this matter to go over until to-morrow morning—I shall not debate it further—so that we may take a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator that going over to-day means a delay of the measure until next Monday.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that this information is not to be gathered for five or six years yet anyway.

Mr. CARTER. The bill relates exclusively to the matter of administration; and certain work in the census is now being delayed—for instance, in the laying out of districts.

Mr. ALLEN. The matter of administration means the appointment of certain persons desiring positions.

Mr. CARTER. That is a very minor part of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Nebraska did not answer my question, and I am afraid I did not make it clear. I did not ask him whether he thought that trusts, as they are called, are injurious or beneficial to the country, and I did not raise any question as to the collection of all the information about them being for the interest of the country. I think it is to the interest of the country to get all the information we can in the speediest way. But I understood him to go further and to propose to have the report of the census state whether trusts are beneficial or injurious to the country in the opinion of somebody.

Mr. ALLEN. No; to gather the information.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am stating what I understood.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I beg your pardon.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I understood the amendment to be—that somebody, some public official, is to report to us what is the effect of trusts on the interests of the country; and I asked him whose opinion on that point was the one to be reported, whether it was the enumerator or some clerk or the Director of the Census. Now, will the Senator have the amendment read, and he will see,

I think, not only that I was likely to so understand it, but that I understood it correctly.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the Reporter read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read by the Reporter.

The amendment was read by the Reporter, as follows:

And provided further, That the Director of the Census shall also cause to be enumerated all industrial and other combinations known as trusts, their situs, the amount of their capitalization and the actual capital invested in them, their effect on the laborers and consumers of the country; and he shall also gather and tabulate all other information with reference to them necessary to a clear understanding of their character and effect on the Government.

Mr. HOAR. That is the point I make, if the Senator will pardon me, that the Director of the Census shall cause to be enumerated the effect of the trusts on the business of the country. That is the logical effect—

Mr. ALLEN. It may be the effect of it. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] criticises my pronunciation of the word "situs," and it may be that the construction of the language I have used is not proper.

Mr. HOAR. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. ALLEN. Indeed, I am prepared for surprises of all kinds and to find that possibly there are no trusts in the country. So far as the effect of the language the Senator from Massachusetts refers to is concerned, I do not see the slightest thing to obstruct the obtaining of accurate information of the effect of these organizations upon the Government itself. I do not profess to say how this is to be done, but I know how I would do it if I were the Director of the Census.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. ALLEN. No; let me finish my reply and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to ask a question.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not finished my answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts. I would select the most competent men I could find to gather this information. In the first place, I would have Congress authorize me, if I could get it to do so, to appoint men who would have quasi-judicial power, if I have properly pronounced the word "quasi," and who, like a committee of Congress, should travel over the country to the situs of the different industrial organizations, and there inquire and take the evidence of those who know anything about the effect of those institutions in that community; whether they have reduced their labor force; whether they have reduced their wages; what has become of the persons thrown out of labor; whether they have raised the price of their manufactured articles; whether they have curtailed the output, and so on, ad infinitum, if that is correctly pronounced.

Mr. HOAR. Ad infinitum.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, ad infinitum, if that is more comprehensible. I am glad even at 53 years of age to know that my education is imperfect and that I still have an opportunity to improve, and, Mr. President, I rejoice that upon my right I have the culture of the extreme East and upon my left I have the culture of the extreme South to assist me in my struggle. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senator pronounced that syllable short to save the time of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly. Now that information is not difficult to ascertain. We send out committees almost every year to gather up specific information. A riot occurs in the country, or another matter of great importance to the country takes place, and we want to know what the facts may be and what is the truth respecting it.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Is it in the way of correcting my pronunciation? [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. We have an industrial commission now that is investigating this subject, I am told. It has very ample authority and ample means, and it is composed of eminent men, some of them members of the Senate. Are they not engaged in this work?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know why they are not.

Mr. ALLISON. They are, I understand.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I sympathize very deeply with the purpose the Senator has in view, and I am sure every Senator here would like to have correct information as to the location, which I think, if the Senator will permit me, is a better word than situs, of the various corporations.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator say situs or situs?

Mr. TILLMAN. I never saw the word except in the ablative case and in what little Latin I read, "in situ." I say situs, but of course I do not belong to that class of men who are well educated, and like my friend here, who is a graduate of a college. I quit school at 17, about the time the Senator did, and I have been knocking around for a living ever since, and I am not putting up any pretense to be learned. But I would say that as to the location, as well as the actual works of the combinations of capital known as trusts, any man in the Senate will thank the Senator if he can define them in a bill in such a way that the enumerator, or special agent, or a committee on the census, or anybody else will be able to go immediately to any city where these people are at work, and will know where to find the man or men whom he must interrogate.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator will find 200 of them in the World Almanac.

Mr. TILLMAN. I expect there are 5,000 of them in the United States to-day. A large number of them have got charters from New Jersey, as I understand. But that is not the point now. The bill which is being pressed by the Senator from Montana looks to perfecting the working machinery for taking the census; in other words, the administrative features of the Census Office. It does not deal at all with the character of the work. If the Senator wants to amend the work—in other words, if he wants to enlarge it—if he wants to gain special information on any given topic, like he does on this, I am sure, judging from the conditions which are existing, the Republicans, who are going to howl in the next election as being the very sternest enemies and oppressors of trusts—

Mr. ALLEN. They are doing that now—

Mr. TILLMAN. Will join him in such a bill, and the Democrats will, who are going to howl that the Republicans are the friends of trusts and they are hypocrites, and all that kind of thing, and I will join the Senator in charging that. But please let the pending bill pass now just as it is; and let the Senator bring in a proposition for an amendment of the census law defining what a trust is, and what a combination of capital or association of capitalists is, or any other thing which he can designate with certainty as being a trust. I am sure the Senate will pass it without a word.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, Mr. President, I am sorry to see that my friend from South Carolina has gone, too.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is so ambiguous that I would like to ask the Senator in what direction I go. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know in what direction he has gone or in what direction he is going. Mr. President, it is the sheerest kind of nonsense to say that the bill provides simply for the administrative features of the census, and therefore you can not put anything else in it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not say that the census law can not be amended and probably enlarged in a way that it will be valuable. I do not think that we were perfect when we framed it last winter, because we were rushed. But, if the Senator will permit me, I am sure that the way to amend the law, if we should propose to enlarge its scope and incorporate new schedules in it, is not by attempting to amend this special bill that we now have under consideration.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, every well-drawn act (and it does not take an expert or a college graduate to know it; sometimes the college graduate knows the least about it) prescribes duties and its own administration. There never was a criminal statute drawn in the world creating a crime or defining a crime that it did not prescribe its administration, its enforcement. To say now that we must indulge in refinement, that we must have a bill creating certain duties upon the part of the Director of the Census, and then another bill directing the method of the performance of those duties, in my humble judgment is the worse kind of rot, if I may put it in that language.

All I have asked in this proposed amendment is that the Director of the Census shall gather this information. Now, Mr. President, we have Senators who throw up their hands and protest against it. Not one of them will stand upon the floor of the Senate and say that the information is not desirable. Even my friend from South Carolina, who I supposed was the deadly enemy of these organizations in so far as they injuriously affect the country, seems to want to side track this amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I must protest that my language does not bear any such construction. I am simply trying to assist him in the object he seeks to accomplish, and that is, first, that the associations shall be so designated or described that the enumerator or special agent or special agents will be able to find them. Simply to designate something somewhere as a trust, if the Senator will permit me, reminds me very much of an expression that I have heard in the South in my childhood from the old darkies with whom I used to 'possum hunt. I have gone out with those old gray-headed fellows, as boys like to do, you know, running around at night with a torch when the moon was not shining hunting 'possum—'possum, if you prefer it; we do not put the "o" on.

Mr. ALLEN. Common 'possum will do me.

Mr. TILLMAN. A 'possum hound or dog is a very trusty and tried friend of the colored person, or the nigger, to turn to the vernacular; he rarely fails to do the work right. He would strike a trail, and we would follow it, pushing along more or less vigorously as he would proceed, and as he got hotter and hotter on the trail those of us who were trying to keep up with him, you know, would follow close. After a while he would come to a tree and rear up on it and bark.

Well, we thought we certainly were going to have "possum and 'taters" next day, and we would go to work, having an ax along, of course, or two of them, and cut that tree down. Lo and behold when the dogs would rush in there was not a thing up there, and the darkies would immediately say "Let's go home; that dog was running haunts." [Laughter.] Now you are running haunts, my friend. There is no 'possum up that tree. My friend from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] who is by my side did not understand me because I gave the nigger pronunciation. It is haunts, meaning spirits.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am afraid my friend from South Carolina has strayed from the true path. I appreciate, of course, this little diversion and his reference to his unsuccessful 'possum hunt. I had some experience in that line of business myself when a boy. But, Mr. President, you can not laugh down this question, and the Senator from South Carolina will never be able to explain to the people of that State why at the critical moment when this information was in the reach of the Congress of the United States he took the attitude he takes here at this moment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me again?

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator's stories are not too long, I am perfectly willing to listen to him.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no story to tell, Mr. President; I simply tried to illustrate the position. I sympathize with the Senator. The Senators on both sides of the Chamber are ready to pass any bill he can bring in here which will define clearly and distinctly what he proposes to designate as a trust. There are no friends of trusts here in the open. There is not anybody here, if the Senator will locate a trust and prove that it is a trust, but who will give him the right to inquire into its business by some census officer.

Mr. ALLEN. Here stands a Senator in the middle of the Senate Chamber declaring in the year 1900 that there is no such thing as a trust.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not declare anything of the kind, because I know there are thousands of trusts in the United States. Everything we wear, eat, or have anything to do with, even to the smallest, is in charge of trusts now, and the people are being robbed by them.

Mr. ALLEN. Why, then, does the Senator from South Carolina want me to draft an amendment defining what a trust is?

Mr. TILLMAN. Simply for the reason that the census enumerator can not possibly under your amendment go to any manufacturing establishment and say, "I have authority to investigate you, and I declare you to be a trust." You must declare under the law what a trust is before this man will have authority to go to any association of capitalists or any manufacturing establishment and say to them, "Under the law you are described as such and such, and knowing from my personal knowledge that you are a trust, therefore you must answer my inquiries."

Mr. ALLEN. Then we have come to this, that you have got to define every word in a statute by that statute itself. A trust, a corporation, an association are words that are as well understood in the English language as the word "horse" or the word "dog," and yet what does the Senator here desire? That I should frame an amendment to define a trust. Why, Mr. President, the word "fraud" has been used for three hundred years in the legal nomenclature of the English-speaking people, and there is no man alive to-day who can define it.

Mr. DAVIS. The courts have declined to do so.

Mr. ALLEN. As the Senator from Minnesota says, the courts have repeatedly declined to undertake to define it. It is capable of so many phases, can be presented in so many forms, that no court, from the establishment of the English courts down to the courts of the United States this day, undertakes to define the word "fraud." Yet, Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina would have me draft an amendment that would undertake to define, and possibly that would be destructive of the very ends intended.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, always.

Mr. TILLMAN. If, with your magnificent training as a lawyer, legislator, and statesman, you decline the task of defining what a trust is, how in the name of common sense can you ask some three or five dollar a day man, who is hunting around here for a job as a census enumerator or special agent, to go and designate them? He would not know them if he met one on the road. [Laughter.] I should like to ask the Senator, and I know he has no more admiration for the author of that expression than I have, what would he say in regard to that famous remark, "A public office is a public trust"? Does that come in as an example of the subject that he would have investigated?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not see, really, the application of the last remark. But I understand Mr. Cleveland is not the author of that remark.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply wish the Senator not to try to do me any injury with my constituents at home by undertaking to announce here as his opinion that I am bamboozled and debauched by my associates in this Chamber.

Mr. ALLEN. Not debauched, Mr. President, but bamboozled. The remark the Senator refers to antedates the advent of Mr. Cleveland into this world by a great many years, and it also antedates the advent of the Senator from South Carolina, and, I believe, the oldest Senator here. But it has no application to this bill or this proposed amendment, and I do not propose to notice it any further. I simply want to say that all this cavil and cajolery about this proposed amendment is designed to side track the amendment and distract the attention of the people from the fact that the Senate of the United States intends to decline this investigation.

The Senator from South Carolina says there is not a Senator here who will not vote to have these institutions enumerated. I can not, of course, speak for the Senate or for any individual Senator further than myself, but if I were out of this Chamber and not subject to its rules I would say that two-thirds, or at least a majority, of the Senators in this Chamber will vote against any measure that looks to the enumeration of these organizations and to an investigation of their influence upon the country. Whether Senators like it or dislike it, whether I please them or displease them—and I desire to please them as far as I can—I propose to bring this subject to the attention of the country in my feeble way and acquit myself of my duty, whether others see fit to do so or not. That is for them to determine.

Mr. President, this Congress does not belong to the members of Congress. This is not my body nor yours. It is the legislative branch of the Government of the people of this country. They sent us here. They want this information. Why not give it to them? There was a distinguished man in this country at one time who is said to have uttered the remark, "The people be damned." That seems to be the spirit in Congress now. There is not the slightest intention of gathering the information on this subject. Here stand these great combinations that are threatening the very life of the nation. Congress sits here impotent and powerless to investigate them and to see what they are and what influence they exercise upon the political institutions of the country.

And why? Because we are dealing with an administrative bill; ergo, you must not touch it with anything else. Senators talk about the administrative features of the bill. There is no reason why they should be bunched together. Every section that creates a duty or a right ought to be followed by administrative language in the same connection.

Of course I do not know what I can do more than to submit to the vote that has been taken here. I would be perfectly contented if Senators would put their votes upon record. I should like to put mine there, Mr. President, and I want the country to understand now that I do put my vote on record, not only in favor of the enumeration of these great organizations and the ascertainment of their influence upon the country and upon our political institutions, but in favor of their destruction as enemies of the country. I did not suppose it was in the heart of a Democrat, especially a Southern Democrat, who had been taught better from his youth up, to obstruct, directly or indirectly, the gathering of this useful information.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I want to say. I wish the Senator from Montana would permit the measure to pass by. I do not want to be forced to the steps that I may be forced to take—I do not want to do that—yet I should like to see a yea-and-nay vote upon this question.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is important that the bill shall be acted upon to-night, and the Senate is so thin that it must be done without a roll call. I suggest to the Senator that the Census Office is very greatly hampered because of its inability, for instance, to pay the expenses of the supervisors in the ordinary work of laying out the enumerating districts. It is desirable that 300 supervisors shall be set at this work immediately. Three days' time or four days' time will be of much consequence in the execution of the work, that must be as nicely poised and in as good form as any piece of machinery in the works of a watch.

Mr. ALLEN. If we do not get the census reports any sooner than we got those of the Eleventh Census, a delay of several days will not be a serious matter.

Mr. CARTER. It is our desire to avoid the delay which attended that census. It is important to have the work pressed forward without unnecessary delay, and I trust the Senator will cooperate with us.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I only want to say a word for the benefit of my friend from Nebraska. I have no uneasiness as to any result to myself of his accusation that I am obstructing or endeavoring to obstruct as an ally to those who wish to keep this information from being obtained.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me? If my language is capable of bearing that construction, it was not my intention.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think the Senator has any idea of doing more than to emphasize his own earnestness in the object he had in view in offering the amendment, and I of course absolve him from any other intention, but his language would necessarily bear the interpretation I put upon it.

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly my remarks were attributable to the Senator's possum story.

Mr. TILLMAN. If my little anecdote has offended the Senator, I am sorry that I told it. I had no purpose except to try to get him into a good humor, so as to let us get through with the bill.

I wish, however, to call the attention of the Senator from Montana, who will not be as frank as I am, to the fact that if he calls for a yea-and-nay vote it will be made manifest there is no quorum present; at least the indications are that there is none. So the bill can not pass to-night, and the Senator can not get a vote upon it. There is no purpose to obstruct the Senator from Nebraska. If he will bring in a bill which will define the associations of capital which he is endeavoring to locate, provide for having their business tabulated and their methods inquired into, and whatever other inquiries he may wish to have made, I feel that I can almost guarantee that the Senate will give him a patient hearing and a yea-and-nay vote, and, if I am not mistaken, will pass the measure.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 301) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Indianapolis, Ind.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 9, section 1, after the words "two million," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty," so as to make the section read:

That the amount heretofore fixed as a limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, court-house, custom-house, internal revenue office, pension office, and other Government offices in the city of Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $2,250,000, which sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost of the site and the erection of said building thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish simply to ask for information in regard to this bill. The building has already been appropriated for, as I recollect.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It was appropriated for at the last session of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. And this bill proposes to increase the limit of cost?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes, sir; that is the fact.

Mr. COCKRELL. What are some of the reasons for it?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The appropriation made in the original bill was less than was necessary; it was quite inadequate. Since then there has been a very considerable increase in the cost of materials and labor, and the land necessary for the building site cost more than was originally estimated.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is very manifest that there has been an increase in the cost of all building material from 25 to 50 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECTION 3005, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 3334) to amend section 3005 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee consisting of nine members of the House of Representatives be immediately appointed by the Speaker to make a thorough and complete investigation of all dealings and transactions between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any other national bank of the United States, from the 4th day of March, 1897, to the present time, and especially in regard to all letters, agreements, papers, or documents between the Treasury Department of the United States or any person connected therewith.

Mr. DALZELL. I rise to a question of order. That resolution belongs in the box.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken.

Mr. SULZER. What is the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is that this is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. SULZER. Then I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SULZER. I am glad to note the objection comes from that side.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move that this resolution lie upon the table?

Mr. HOPKINS. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. HOPKINS. The resolution is not before the House at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I thought it had been read.

The SPEAKER. Read simply for information.

Mr. DALZELL. Read out of order.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. The very clear and complete statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House covers it all.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think, Mr. Speaker, the matter I present is one of privilege—one which affects the integrity of the proceedings of the House. I hold in my hand what purports to be a bill. It is in the form of a bill—that is, the first portion of it—and it is indorsed "H. R. 64. A bill to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States, and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary."

It purports to have been introduced on the 4th day of December, 1899, and to have been referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

The first few pages of this paper is in the form of a bill. The latter pages—four pages—are in different type, and an argument, a partisan argument, in support of the bill. After the conclusion of the bill there are four pages of partisan arguments and facts. It is made up in part of statements purporting to show the effect of the bill, which I controvert, and which every member or almost every member on this side of the House would controvert. But whether on this side or that side, Mr. Speaker, and whether true or false, those statements and arguments have no place in a bill. Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the rules have been grossly violated. I submit that this paper is not frankable by law, and any member of this House or of the other House who has sent out this paper is guilty of having violated the postal law. It is no part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; it is not a bill; the words used, or printed, have never been spoken upon the floor, so far as I know, and the paper is not frankable by law.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Who is the mover of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should be taken from the files, and if the gentleman desires to introduce the bill let it be introduced as all other bills are prepared, presented, and introduced in this House. I make the point of order, first, that the paper should be suppressed—it is not a bill—and, failing in that, I shall move to strike it from the files and have it destroyed.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Who introduced the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this bill, commonly known as the shipping bill, was handed to me on the first day of the session in printed form. I was assured that it was a copy of the bill as reported in the Senate from the Committee on Commerce just before the close of the last session, and I handed in the bill in the regular way. It is true that this argument of Judge Edmunds was with that printed copy and was printed with the bill. I do not think it has any business to be there as a part of the bill. I think that that part of it should be stricken from the bill, but the bill itself, I think, ought to stand.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I submit to him that it would be impossible to separate them, because a portion of the statement is upon the same page as the text of the so-called bill, and it would be impossible to separate it; and there can be nothing done effectually except the suppression of this paper and the reintroduction of the bill. I do not reflect upon the gentleman from New York, because I know he would not violate the rules of this House intentionally, but that they have been violated is perfectly apparent to every gentleman. I think the proper course would be to suppress the paper and introduce the bill as a bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is plainly apparent where that bill ends and where the argument commences. There is no difficulty in the House suppressing the argument and still allowing the bill itself to stand. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and in relation to it that committee has already had one hearing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But you can not separate it. You can not send the bill out.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose we have a reprint of the bill, by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to a reprint of the bill, with this argument suppressed.

Mr. PAYNE. I am perfectly willing that all the bills having that argument shall be suppressed—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Taken from the files.

Mr. PAYNE (continuing). And that the bill itself be reprinted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to that. I have no right to object to the gentleman introducing a bill in proper form.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the print of the bill be suppressed and the bill be reprinted without the argument.

Mr. GAINES. We want the argument suppressed, too.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It will be taken from the files.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that that request should have coupled with it that the committee be discharged from the consideration of the bill, it not being before the House, and then have it reprinted.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection, if the bill be referred to the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the bill proper is before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and they have entered upon the consideration of the bill. I do not think that any action should be taken that would take from them jurisdiction of that bill at the present time. The argument that is mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee is separable from the bill itself, and if he desires any action taken upon that I have no objection; but I do have objection to the suppression of the bill itself, which our committee is now considering.

The SPEAKER. That could be obviated by an order to rerefer it to the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There would be no difficulty about reintroducing the bill, and let it go to the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no objection, if the gentleman will limit his motion to the suppression of what he calls the argument of Judge Edmunds. That is entirely separate and distinct from the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will examine the bill, it will be seen that it is printed on the same page with the text of the bill, and it can not be separated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee is a good one. The bill is not before the House—it is before the committee, and it seems that it is improperly before the committee; and now the request should be that the committee be discharged from the consideration of the bill, this objectionable part eliminated, and the bill re-referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries with a new order to print. If there be no objection to such an order, it will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

STENOGRAPHER TO COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to introduce the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions be authorized to appoint a stenographer for said committee, whose salary shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and which shall not exceed $100 per month.

Mr. RICHARDSON was recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if the resolution has been considered by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that I understood the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has this resolution been referred to the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No; it has not. Our purpose is to avoid delay in this matter as much as possible.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask if the committee has not already a clerk and an assistant clerk?

Mr. SULLOWAY. The committee has a clerk and an assistant clerk.

Mr. BARTLETT. And neither one of them are stenographers?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Neither of them; and it is practically impossible to do the work without a stenographer, as every member of the committee knows.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution take the usual course.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects, and the resolution will go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 15, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

To the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting at Washington, D. C.:

At a mass meeting of the farmers of Red River County and the citizens of Clarksville, held this the 8th day of January, 1900, for the purpose of solemnly protesting against the financial legislation recently embodied in the House bill and now under consideration by the Senate, the following resolutions were unanimously passed: Resolved, that,

Whereas the House of Representatives has recently passed a bill for the purpose of changing the financial system of these States from gold and silver, the money of the Constitution, to gold alone; and

Whereas there is such a bill now pending in the Senate, which, should it pass and become the law, would in our judgment be the greatest calamity that could befall our beloved country; and

Whereas the values of all farm products, wages, and property have always since the beginning of the world been measured by both gold and silver, and it is now sought by a small minority of our citizens for selfish reasons, through the aid of the peoples' Representatives in Congress, to change this system, by which all values will be measured by gold only, thus doubling the value of money and all obligations payable in money and lowering one-half the values of all farm products, labor, wages, and property, which would be the greatest wrong, outrage, injustice, and robbery ever attempted to be perpetrated upon the people of any country or any age since the dawn of civilization; and

Whereas there are thirty millions or more farmers and their dependents and others in the millions who would be grossly outraged and unjustly discriminated against in favor of a few million bankers and capitalists by the passage of this law: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, farmers and citizens of Red River County and Clarksville, of the State of Texas, do hereby solemnly protest against the passage of said financial bill, and petition your honorable body not to pass this bill and radically change the financial system of these States. And further

Resolved, That the American people are deeply attached to the silver dollar and will view with alarm and anger any legislation which seeks to destroy it as the legal-tender dollar of the people, which is ingrained in the affections of the people—as well seek to destroy the Bible; and we further ask and petition the Senate to pass a bill opening the mints of the United States to silver on like and equal terms with gold, so that the bonds and indebtedness of the people may be paid by them in gold or silver, as per solemn contract entered into by the bondholders with the people, which said contract the bondholders are now seeking to repudiate through legislation; and we further petition your honorable body, if necessary, to change the coinage of our silver and gold coins to make them conform to those of England and France, namely, the 5-franc piece and the English pound, by which England outbids us for gold and France for silver, and the silver and gold coins of the United States will then circulate and remain in this country, the opinions of some to the contrary notwithstanding; and we further petition your honorable body to set aside the infamous bill passed by the House of Representatives, in order that a great calamity may be averted from the farmers and masses of the States and we and our children saved from the machinations and greed of the money power.

House memorial No. 3. State of Washington. Sixth regular session.
To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the house of representatives and senate of the State of Washington, most respectfully represent that—

Whereas Snake River is one of the largest tributaries of the Columbia River; and

Whereas Snake River is navigable from Riparia to Asotin City, Wash., at all times during the year; and

Whereas Snake River above Asotin City, Wash., is navigable to the mouth of Grande Ronde River, a distance of 20 (25?) miles, about six months in each year, beginning about the 1st of March and ending about the 1st of September; and

Whereas, owing to obstructions in Snake River at the following points: Ten-Mile, Captain John, and Billy Creek rapids, the navigation of Snake

River above Asotin City, Wash., is wholly obstructed for six months during the year, thereby working a hardship and financial loss to the numerous settlers living in the southeastern section of the State of Washington; and

Whereas the shipping points on Snake River above Asotin City, Wash., are Waha, Cousecreek, and Grande Ronde landings; and

Whereas the number of bushels of wheat stored at Waha Landing during the years 1896 and 1899 is 140,000 bushels, and the number of bushels of wheat stored at Cousecreek Landing during the year 1896 and 1899 is 16,000 bushels; and

Whereas the landing at the mouth of Grande Ronde, on Snake River, is used as the principal shipping point for live stock and other products of the range of the southeastern portion of the State of Washington; and

Whereas the obstruction to the navigation of Snake River at Ten-Mile Rapids consists of large bowlders in the channel of Snake River, and the removal of said bowlders will remove the obstructions to the navigation of Snake River at this point; and

Whereas the obstruction to the navigation of Snake River at Captain John and at Billey Creek rapids consists of bowlders and solid rock, which, when removed, will clear the obstructions to the navigation of Snake River at those points, thereby opening up Snake River to navigation for a distance of 25 miles above Asotin City, Wash.: Be it therefore

Resolved, by the legislature of the State of Washington, That the State of Washington respectfully ask the Congress of the United States to appropriate $20,000 for the purpose of removing the obstructions to navigation in Snake River between Asotin City, Wash., and the mouth of the Grande Ronde River. Be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress are requested to use their most earnest efforts to procure an appropriation for the improvement of Snake River between Asotin City, Wash., and the mouth of the Grande Ronde River.

And your memorialists will, as in duty bound, ever pray.

Passed the senate February 2, 1899.

Senate joint memorial No. 2. State of Washington, sixth regular session.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent: That the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Seattle passed the following preambles and resolutions:

"Whereas, by reason of the annexation of Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and other islands during the past few months, and by reason of the changed condition of affairs in Cuba, the Philippines, and elsewhere, new and unbounded opportunities for commerce have been opened to the capitalists, business men, and marine interests of the United States; and

"Whereas, with a proper encouragement by Congress, it is certain that no industry and no interest will be more favorably affected in consequence of these great changes in our national affairs than shipbuilding and shipowning, which may not only be restored to their former great prominence, but may also be placed on a higher plane, rivaling that even of Great Britain; and

"Whereas commerce and trade is as essential to the life and prosperity of our nation as mining, manufacturing, and agriculture, at least to the extent of conducting its own carrying trade; and

"Whereas this country is very deficient in its merchant marine and depends largely upon foreign bottoms for its ocean traffic; and
